PRAYERS

[Mr. Speaker in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Theatres

1. Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): How many theatres in England and Wales receive public subsidy. [194566]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): Some 236 theatres receive public subsidy from Arts Council England. In addition, local authorities invest more than £220 million in the arts each year, some of which goes to theatres. The figures for Wales are a matter for the Welsh Assembly.

Chris Bryant: Notwithstanding the fact that my right hon. Friend has no responsibility for Wales, I hope that she will visit the new millennium centre theatre in Cardiff soon. I believe that it holds the prospect of being one of best theatres in the land.

I want to ask my right hon. Friend about west end theatre. She knows that it is one of Britain's greatest assets, especially for foreign tourists. Yet 46,856 seats in London's west end theatres do not receive a single penny of state subsidy simply because they are run in the commercial sector, despite the fact that many are listed buildings. Is that fair? Is not it time that the Labour Government discovered some new way, perhaps a third way, of helping?

Estelle Morris: I look forward to visiting the new millennium centre—I wish it well. It is nice to go to places for which one does not have responsibility now and again.

I readily acknowledge the excellence, worldwide reputation and contribution to the nation's economy of west end theatres. That contribution is estimated at approximately £1.5 billion. As my hon. Friend knows, there is a genuine problem about publicly subsidising commercial theatres. However, I acknowledge theatres' problems and, earlier this year, the Secretary of State and I brought together all interested parties, including theatres, local authorities and our Department. We asked people to try to devise what might be a third way; we certainly hope that it will be a strategy. We look forward to the report, which we expect some time before Christmas.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): Does the Minister also appreciate that many important listed buildings provide wonderful productions throughout the country, not only in the west end? If the Minister and the Government are considering supporting great historic buildings in which theatres perform throughout the year, they should examine not only the specific problems of the listed theatres in London but of those throughout the country.

Estelle Morris: I readily accept that. Let us be clear: Ministers will not decide where the public funds go. Many buildings, including theatres that are listed and those that are not, are vital to their community and often need repair and refurbishment. It is a long haul because there are many theatres and not as much money to go round.

Approximately half the money that is believed to be generated through theatres comes from the west end. Although I do not belittle or fail to understand the importance of theatres in their communities, there is something extra special about the London west end. If we witnessed its demise, everybody, no matter where our constituencies are based, would view that as a cause for sorrow. Let us hope that we are considering a question of not either/or but, over the years, both.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend referred to the role of local government in supporting local theatres. I know that she has visited the arts centre in the mechanics building in Burnley but not the theatre. Does she acknowledge that councils such as Burnley find it increasingly difficult to fund such arts centres and theatres and need more assistance from the Government, especially when local council budgets are being squeezed so tightly?

Estelle Morris: It may be that some local authorities find it difficult but many make it a priority. When they decide that the arts and culture are essential to their community, the money is found. I congratulate and thank local authorities that have prioritised those matters and urge those that have not to do so.

Gambling Bill

2. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): What assessment she has made of the level of protection that the Gambling Bill gives to (a) young people and (b) other vulnerable persons. [194567]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): The Gambling Bill, the Second Reading of which the House will debate later today, will provide significantly greater safeguards for children and vulnerable adults than the present law. The status quo is dangerous and unacceptable because the current law does not allow Government or the Gaming Board to regulate the many new technologies, such as video roulette machines, in betting shops or online gambling sites. Without the Bill, which has been strengthened by pre-legislative scrutiny, problem gambling is likely to increase. The safeguards will enable the regulator—the proposed new gambling commission—and the Government to keep the position firmly under control and to act swiftly to cut back the supply of gambling opportunities, should that prove necessary.

Simon Hughes: I hope that the Secretary of State accepts that the best estimate is that 300,000 people are defined as problem gamblers. During the scrutiny process, she told the Committee that, if the Bill produced more problem gamblers, it would have failed. Does she maintain the view that the 10 per cent. of the Bill that is controversial will not add one more problem gambler to the number? Given that no one else shares that view, will she reconsider the basis of her opinion?

Tessa Jowell: Maintaining the current low level of problem gambling is one of the Bill's objectives and protection from harm is a theme that runs all the way through the Bill. What has been lost in recent controversy about the Bill is the sheer scale of the gambling commission's power to wind back any liberalisation of the gambling regime in the event of harm being established. Moreover, through the gambling survey, we shall have clear figures providing a baseline on which we can judge future trends. The success of—and, indeed, continued access to—gambling technologies will be judged on their ability to provide entertainment rather than generating problem gambling.

I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman that, given more gambling opportunities, there will not be a single extra problem gambler. It would be ridiculous to say that. People are at risk now from gambling on the internet and from unregulated offshore sites. But—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Other Members may wish to ask questions.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, Central) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State accept that the greatest protection for gambling addicts is related to the number of casinos? I support the broad aims of the Bill, but I am worried about the potential for increase.

Let me give an example from my constituency. Two casinos serve north-east Scotland and, so far, Aberdeen city council has had to deal with six applications for outline planning permission for future casinos. I am particularly worried about the local authorities that will be involved in the licensing. I want to ensure that they are protected properly, because at present they are squeezed between protecting the interests of local electors and the enormous cost of appeals. I want a robust licensing system. Can the Secretary of State reassure me?

Tessa Jowell: Let me make three quick points. In countries such as Australia, where problem gambling has become a major issue, the proliferation of machines rather than casinos has been responsible. We have learnt from that lesson. We also see the need for a tough regulator who can act to prevent harm. Finally, local authorities will have a clearly defined power to decide that they do not want any casinos in their areas. It will be effective for three years, and renewable thereafter.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): Can the Secretary of State explain why the gaming machines to be found in chip shops, for instance, which offer a £5 maximum payout for a 10p stake, are so corrupting to children? What evidence has she? Can she also explain why, given that local authorities already have power to ban such machines, they have not done so?

Tessa Jowell: I welcome the hon. Lady's newly discovered interest in gambling, but we are pursuing the Bill's key objective, which is to protect children from gambling and, in particular, from the risks of ambient gambling—chancing on a machine when they happen to be standing around doing something else. We intend to remove those risks from children, which is why the 6,000 entirely unregulated machines in chip shops, minicab offices and the like are to be withdrawn.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton) (Lab): I welcome much of the Bill, but I find it offensive that large American companies will be able to buy planning permission for casinos from local authorities. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that that will be dealt with in Committee, and will not happen?

Tessa Jowell: American companies are already considerable investors in the United Kingdom economy. We will accept American investment, Japanese investment and Australian investment, but we will subject it to a British regulatory regime that is right for the people of this country and acceptable to them.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): All the experts, including the Secretary of State's own Ministers, agree that accessibility to gambling opportunities is the key factor contributing to a rise in problem gambling. How then can the Secretary of State claim to be increasing protection for children and the vulnerable when greater access is to be encouraged by withdrawing the membership rules, allowing ambient access to unlimited-prize category A gaming machines for the first time ever in this country, and when regional planning policy, run through the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, positively skews the location of the new regional casinos towards the greatest density of population in our city centres?

Tessa Jowell: To deal with the third point first, that is not necessarily the case because the gambling commission may well decide to issue advice to local authorities by which they will be bound about the criteria that should be applied when considering the location of the very large casinos. But that is a perfectly reasonable question.

With regard to getting rid of membership rules, modern gambling is not about membership of gentlemen's clubs. People gamble as a leisure pursuit in ever increasing numbers, so we seek to strike a proper boundary between the legitimate right of adults to choose to spend their leisure time as they wish within the law, while at the same time regulating for human frailty, protecting the vulnerable, and, in particular, protecting children from the harm that gambling can create.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): I recognise that perhaps as much as 90 per cent. of the Bill can be supported, but is my right hon. Friend aware that there are two anxieties—that there is no maximum number of casinos and, that that, inevitably, along with other clauses in the Bill, is bound to increase gambling? Why should we be involved in doing so, when already too many vulnerable people are in gambling debt and that can only increase? There is a great deal to be said for the Cabinet and my right hon. Friend reconsidering the controversial aspects of the measure and then coming back to the House. As it stands, some of us will find it impossible to vote for it at 10 o'clock.

Tessa Jowell: I respect my hon. Friend's views. I know that gambling is an issue that will divide the House on other than the normal party political lines and I respect the views of those who feel that gambling is quite simply wrong. But in relation to the very large casinos that have been the subject of much of the controversy and publicity in the last week or so, the estimate—it is an industry estimate, not a Government one—is that there are likely to be between 20 and 40. I will not now but later set out in detail the tough regulatory regime, a combination of the role of the gambling commission and the planning regime, that will determine whether they develop in any part of the country at all.

Gambling in this country is lawful and it is increasing. Millions of people choose to gamble as a leisure activity. The urgent need is for regulation to ensure that we do not see an increase in problem gambling and that people are not exploited.

Darts

3. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): What progress has been made in making darts an officially recognised sport. [194568]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): Decisions as to whether particular activities and pastimes should be recognised as sports for official and funding purposes are made by unanimous agreement between the sports councils. I understand that the sports councils are unlikely to reach a consensus on the recognition of darts as a sport in the foreseeable future.

Bob Russell: Does the Minister agree that millions of people who play darts regard it as a sport, as do local and national newspapers and television? Is it not time that the sports bodies in this country recognised darts as a sport, as millions of people believe it to be, and stopped behaving in an elitist—[HON. MEMBERS: "Snobbish."]—and snobbish way?

Mr. Caborn: I know that the hon. Gentleman feels strongly about this, but I refer him again to the Sports Council, which is certainly not elitist and does an extremely good job, as he knows. The definition goes back to the Physical Training and Recreation Act 1937. I ask him to reflect on whether darts fits into the category of "physical training and recreation". The sports bodies say no, and that was confirmed in a review in 1997, and again by UK Sport in 2000, as he has been told on previous occasions.

Public Service Broadcasting

4. Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): If she will make a statement on the recently published Ofcom review of public service broadcasting, with specific reference to its implications for regional television. [194569]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): The second phase of Ofcom's public service television review, published on 30 September, represents an important contribution to the debate about the future of public service broadcasting. All Ofcom's proposals, including those relating to regional television in England, are currently out to consultation, following which Ofcom will publish its final recommendations in due course.

Nick Harvey: What is the Government's vision for the future of ITV? Does the Minister understand the concern of the people working in regional ITV and watching it about Ofcom's proposal to reduce the obligations and its warning that even that reduced level may not be sustainable? Does she want ITV to continue into the longer term as a regional broadcaster? Given that, after digital switchover, the licence will not have its previous value, what system of sticks and carrots could she bring to bear to ensure that ITV remains a regional broadcaster?

Estelle Morris: The vision is one that continues ITV's current regional obligations. Members of Parliament will well know the importance of regional broadcasting as a means of communicating, at least from this place, to people elsewhere. After digital switchover, whenever it arrives, things will change, and I see the paper that Ofcom has published very much as an opportunity to discuss important issues about what regional programming might look like in the future. It is not for Government to comment now. The consultation is still open, and Ofcom will reflect on it and let us know its decision. There is a statutory framework that means that regional programming obligations will continue, but how they are manifested is not set in stone. We must keep our minds open about what changes may be necessary in the light of technological advances.

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): The creative industries are among the most important industries in the south-west, working closely with higher education establishments in places such as Plymouth, Bristol and Bournemouth. Those establishments in turn have a strong and important relationship with regional broadcasters, which help to sustain them as institutions. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that she will be robust with Ofcom to ensure that regional TV production is retained, in order to support the important creative industries in my region?

Estelle Morris: I acknowledge the importance of the creative industries as a sector that is growing at twice the rate of any other industrial sector in our country, so of course we must ensure that we train for it and establish links from universities into its work. I do not foresee a future with no regional programming obligations on either ITV or the BBC, and I believe that the Ofcom report made that clear, but we are in a period of change, and change brings uncertainty. With digital switchover on the horizon, it would be silly to bury our head in the sand and think that those regional obligations could continue in exactly their current form, but I am sure that Ofcom will bear in mind the important and valuable point that my hon. Friend makes.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Does the Minister accept that regional television, including regional news, is as clear a case as can be of public service broadcasting, as it would simply not be provided for profit, and is not Ofcom therefore entirely right to point out that the old matching inducement of cheap analogue spectrum to finance it is of diminishing value? Will she be prepared to bite the bullet and at least not rule out in advance any sensible and imaginative means of finding the resources to fund this essential local programming when, before very long, it becomes necessary?

Estelle Morris: I agreed with the first two thirds of the hon. Gentleman's question, but it is too early to go beyond the consultation on the Ofcom document. It would be unwise, while that consultation continues, to say what the Government's plans are. The nature of the consultation is to listen. Let there be no misunderstanding: the proposal in the document concerned a reduction from three hours to one and a half affecting non-news items at off-peak hours only. He did not mention it, but I share his great concern that regional news should be covered at a regional level. That is an important element of a strong democracy, with strong accountability. Let me put it on the record that Ofcom has not suggested any change on that.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Is the Minister aware of real concern in Wales about the possible loss of an independent terrestrial broadcaster, and is she aware in particular of the important role of independent TV news? Will she assure us that she will not countenance a situation in which the BBC operates the only regional TV news network in Wales?

Estelle Morris: I take my hon. Friend's point; the BBC has an important part to play in regional broadcasting, but there is an issue about making sure that more than one organisation has that obligation. I will reflect on his comments and make sure that they are fed back as part of the consultation process.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): Further to that answer, does the Minister agree that ITV in the Welsh context is not just a regional broadcaster but the national English-language broadcaster? There is more to culture and nation than simply news: in fact, most people do not listen to the news but to drama and light entertainment, which also help to inform their views about democracy. From that perspective, is it not vital that we retain a commercial interest and a commercial station broadcasting in Wales, and in the regions of England?

Estelle Morris: The hon. Gentleman is right in some ways. In the regions of England, it probably is the news that is most important and of most interest. The position in the other countries is different from that in England, and Ofcom recognised that in its consultation document and is giving the point special attention. I join the hon. Gentleman in saying that regional television in Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales is important linguistically and culturally, and I am pleased that that has been reflected in the consultation document.

Olympic Games

5. Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): If she will make a statement on progress with the 2012 Olympic bid. [194570]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): The London 2012 Olympic bid is making excellent progress and was given a huge boost by the presence of more than 10,000 British sports fans at the Athens games in August, along with exceptional support from the Prime Minister, the Sports Minister, Ken Livingstone, Lord Coe and myself. The candidate file for the bid will be presented to the International Olympic Committee on 15 November, and we have already begun planning for the crucial IOC evaluation commission visit, which will take place from 16 to 19 February next year.

Mr. Love: My right hon. Friend will be aware of the recent poll showing 70 per cent. support for the Olympic bid. We all also welcome the fact that 200,000 people turned out in London to welcome home our Olympic athletes.

All the evidence from both Athens and Sydney is that we will need a large number of volunteers to make the Olympics successful. In Sydney, for example, 50,000 volunteers were needed, and I suspect that that figure will translate to 60,000 for London. What efforts are my right hon. Friend and the bid partners making to ensure we get that level of support and have enough volunteers when the Olympics come here?

Tessa Jowell: The bid team is already beginning work on recruiting volunteers, and we estimate that 70,000 to 80,000, from all over the country, are likely to be needed. What is important about our bid, as my hon. Friend made clear, is that support in London is beginning to take off, and we have to ensure that that support is echoed all around the country. The members of the International Olympic Committee will need to be confident that they are awarding the games to a city in a country that really wants them. The message we want to send out loud and clear is that Britain really wants the Olympics, and London really wants the Olympics.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): As a fellow London Member, does the Secretary of State regard it as acceptable that the Mayor of London has signed a blank cheque on behalf of all Londoners for the overrun costs of the Olympic games? Is this in fact a London or a national Olympic games?

Tessa Jowell: It is the London Olympics in the United Kingdom. We have always been absolutely clear about that, and that is the basis on which Opposition parties have supported the games. It simply is not true to say that the Mayor of London has signed a blank cheque. He has made very clear the level of council tax that Londoners will pay—

Mr. Field indicated dissent.

Tessa Jowell: That, frankly, is the old Tory trick. The Mayor has set out the position absolutely clearly—38p a week. If the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) wants to stand up for the bid in London, he will stop playing political games with it.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): On the poll that the Secretary of State referred to, she will have noted that support in Scotland for a London Olympics is significantly lower than in the rest of the United Kingdom. There are some good reasons for that. She must explain clearly to those in Scotland what is in this for them. What would she say to the Scottish people who remain concerned that the use of lottery funds should not mean that our charities, grass-roots sports and good causes are raided to pay for a London Olympics?

Tessa Jowell: London, along with all the other parts of the United Kingdom, including Scotland, will benefit from the Olympic games. Support has not been as high as we would have liked, but there is an opportunity for every Member who represents a Scottish constituency, or who goes to Scotland, to talk up the benefit of the bid, not only for London, but for the whole UK.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): May I take this opportunity to reiterate our support for the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic bid as something that will benefit all parts of the United Kingdom? The Secretary of State will be aware that the current plans require a great deal of the funding for the bid, if successful, to come from the Olympic lottery that is to be introduced. Is she aware that the regulatory impact assessment for the Gambling Bill shows that, if that Bill goes ahead, the receipts to the Olympic lottery will be cut, possibly by as much as £27 million a year, which is more than £100 million over five years? How does she plan to plug that gap?

Tessa Jowell: We will discuss the detail of the Gambling Bill later. Suffice it to say that maintaining the strength of the lottery was an important consideration in judging the legislative proposals in that Bill—hence our rejection of Sir Alan Budd's recommendations that side betting on the lottery be allowed or that there be a single regulator.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): Nobody who saw the Athens Olympics could doubt the benefits that hosting the games brings to any city. However, given that the Sydney games overspent by £1.3 billion and that Athens has overspent by nearly £3 billion to date, will the Secretary of State confirm that any overspend on the London bid will be split between the lottery and London council tax payers? The cost to both could be considerable.

Tessa Jowell: Neither the Sydney games nor the Athens games had the degree of budgetary detail established at the point at which we are now. We have substantial contingency in the estimated call on the public finances, through both council tax and the lottery, and we are confident that a London games will be run within the budgetary limits that will be set out in the candidate file.

Digital Television

6. Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): If she will make a statement on the date for the switch-off of analogue television transmission. [194571]

8. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): If she will make a statement on digital switchover. [194573]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State issued a statement in July 2004 on the progress being made towards digital switchover. She noted that although broadcasters had not reached a full consensus, some had suggested that 2012 might be the most appropriate date for the completion of switchover. However, a final decision on the timetable has not yet been taken.

Mr. Sanders: What is the Government's response to pensioners in my constituency who get a free TV licence but who will not be able to receive any television pictures when the digital switchover takes place? Will they get a bit extra in their pensions to compensate?

Estelle Morris: I apologise if I have not quite understood the hon. Gentleman's question, but one of the requirements for switchover is that anybody who receives terrestrial television now will be able to receive digital television. On helping vulnerable groups, he referred to elderly pensioners in his constituency, but as he knows, we have asked that a committee be set up to advise us on that. Consideration of the help that vulnerable groups may need will be one of the factors influencing our decision about when switchover will take place.

Mr. Carmichael: The Minister may be aware that, in many parts of my constituency, we do not have an adequate analogue service and few people believe that that situation will improve come the digital switchover. There is serious concern in the northern isles that, come the digital switchover, we will again be left behind. Will she and her colleagues therefore give some consideration to the proposals from the independent consumer expert group that at least 99.5 per cent. of the population in each region, and not just in the UK as a whole, should be able to receive a digital signal at the point of switchover?

Estelle Morris: I shall certainly consider the recommendations of any group that is looking into this matter, because I accept that it is important. The hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) both have constituencies in which reception of the analogue signal is not great and digital reception is even worse. That situation will remain until switchover. The dilemma of the hon. Gentleman's constituents is that, unless we can get more spectrum, we will not be able to aid them. This is an important switchover to make, but it is absolutely right that we do not make it until we are in receipt of all the information, and that we do it in an orderly and proper way.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): As a Member from a constituency that also has large areas without an analogue signal, I hope that we do not delay the matter indefinitely, as no resources are being spent on upgrading the analogue signal in advance of digital switchover. As well as the geographical criteria, there is an affordability criterion, which the Government recognise in providing free television licences for over-75s. I appreciate that my right hon. Friend will not want to blight the market at this stage, but will she at least acknowledge that the Government understand that some older and poorer people may need assistance in respect of the set-top box, or whatever the technology is by 2012, to help them to make the digital switchover?

Estelle Morris: Of course I accept that there is an issue, otherwise the Government would not have acted as they have done to introduce free television licences for vulnerable groups. That is exactly why we have set up Ofcom's independent consumer panel to look at how the whole of digital switchover may affect vulnerable groups. I am not in a position to say more than that, merely because we are awaiting the report of that panel, but my hon. Friend can rest assured that the matter is on our mind—although that is not a commitment as to exactly what we will do.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): The Minister will be aware that ITV3 launches tonight on digital terrestrial television—that is, freeview—but is she aware that the launch of that new channel will cause problems because of the lack of bandwidth on freeview? Is she aware that, even at present, the system used for compressing technology and television on freeview is already out of date? She said that 2012 might be the time for digital switchover. Will she consider before the next election whether we will use the current system of digital terrestrial television or a system that can increase the number of channels threefold or fourfold?

Estelle Morris: The hon. Gentleman's question is incredibly technical, and I would not claim to match his knowledge on that point. The key issue is that we need more spectrum. Unless we get more spectrum, nothing will change, and we will neither help the constituents of the hon. Members for Torbay and for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) to receive the analogue signal nor enable the 25 per cent. who cannot currently receive digital switchover to do so. That is exactly why the Government have set up bodies, organisations, panels and consumer and broadcast interest groups to make recommendations and advise us on the technicalities. The hon. Gentleman can rest assured that we will take all those matters into account before finally announcing the date of switchover.

National Lottery

7. Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): If she will review the criteria for the allocation of lottery funds to good causes. [194572]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): The criteria for the allocation of lottery funds depend on the distributing body and the individual funding programme concerned. We have set the framework in policy and financial directions for the distributors and they have drawn up strategic plans and funding policies.

Mr. Luff: The general taxpayer has often paid for many good causes through his or her taxes, particularly health and education. The purpose of the lottery is to provide money for other things that general taxation did not pay for—in particular, arts, the Community Fund, heritage and sport. So why is arts funding down £160 million a year under this Government, the Community Fund down £140 million, heritage lottery funding down £120 million and sports down £140 million, while the New Opportunities Fund, all of which should be paid from general taxation, is up £450 million?

Estelle Morris: Part of the reason why the revenues to the original funding streams have changed is that, not this year, but previously, sale of tickets had decreased. There is a direct correlation: if not as many people buy tickets, not as much money is sent to the good causes. I accept the thrust of the hon. Gentleman's question, which I think was additionality. Of course, education, health and the environment have statutory funding, but let me take, for example, two of the things that have been funded from the New Opportunities Fund—after-school homework clubs and the fruit initiative in schools. Those have never been funded out of general taxation for citizens. That expenditure has gone on at exactly the same time as there has been a massive increase in the amount of taxpayers' money—public funding—going to the education and health services and environment. It cannot have replaced direct funding from the Government because Government funding for each of those key services has increased far more than ever it did under the Government whom the hon. Gentleman supported.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): During the review, will my right hon. Friend ensure that all hon. Members are made aware of applications, whether successful or unsuccessful, in their constituencies, so that a proper assessment can be made of where the money is being spent? Could she also reinforce the principle that lottery funding should go to community-based projects that affect people's lives?

Estelle Morris: I will do that. It is important that feedback is given to Members of Parliament. Many right hon. and hon. Members have been helpful in working with the lottery distributors to make sure that their constituents get what might be termed a fair share of the resources. I agree that money doing direct to community use is of great benefit. As my hon. Friend will know, more than half the awards go to the 100 most deprived local authorities. I am sure he shares my pleasure at that.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): Will the Minister acknowledge, first, that the national lottery is a Conservative success story? Is it not the case, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) pointed out, that under the Government more and more money is siphoned off to pay for Government projects—I regard both those that she mentioned as Government projects—with the result that the money given to the original good causes last year was less than half the amount it was when the last Conservative Government left office? The Government's own report estimates that the increase in other gambling as a result of the Gambling Bill may lead to a further loss of up to £70 million from the lottery. Is it not sad that on the lottery's 10th anniversary, the Government seem intent on inflicting still further damage to the good causes?

Estelle Morris: I can well understand the hon. Gentleman, seven years later, trying to find something to claim credit for under the previous Conservative Administration. I give credit to him. I seem to remember, but I may be wrong, that the introduction of the lottery received support from all parties in the House. Never mind; it was a good initiative and it has brought a great deal of much-needed funding to good causes and to other services as well. All I have to say in addition to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) is that if my memory serves me right, we made it clear in our 1997 election manifesto that we would look at what were defined as "good causes". I would bet—given that it is a day for gambling talk—that people who buy lottery tickets think it is a good thing to spend lottery funding on many of the causes that we have added to the legislation, such as education, health and environment.

10. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What the latest figure is for the number of national lottery tickets sold weekly; and what the figure was (a) 12 and (b) 24 months ago. [194575]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): Average weekly sales for the first half of this financial year were £90.5 million. The average weekly sales for 2003–04 were £88.7 million and the average weekly sales for 2002–03 were £87.9 million.

Sir Teddy Taylor: If there is such a huge unmet demand for gambling, as the Government seem to argue in the Bill coming before us, why does the Minister think sales of lottery tickets have not been soaring, in view of the prizes of several million pounds? Does she accept that over the past few years, sales have decreased rather than increased?

Estelle Morris: Whereas last year the question could have been asked why lottery sales had decreased, I am sure the hon. Gentleman will be pleased that they have increased in the past year—a 4.7 per cent. increase on the figure for the same time last year. That is a result of the fact—not my own opinion—that Camelot has diversified the games on offer. It is cautious, and I am not being over-optimistic that it has turned the corner or that more funding will come in for distribution to good causes, but it does not become any of us not to acknowledge that after a period of declining sales, we have seen an increase in sales. I for one am pleased about that, because it will mean more money going to good causes.

Mr. Tony Banks (West Ham) (Lab): May I suggest to my right hon. Friend that one of the ways that perhaps she could do something about the declining revenue from lottery ticket sales and the declining amount of money that has gone to good causes would be to ask my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give up his share of the lottery? The Chancellor wins every week. When the original proposal was brought forward, people did not anticipate that we would be giving so much money to the Treasury.

Estelle Morris: My hon. Friend can suggest that to me but I would merely say that that is a matter for the Treasury.

Football Association

11. Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): What recent discussions she has held with the Football Association on (a) its structure and (b) governance of the sport. [194576]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): As with all governing bodies, the Government's aim is for them to be fit for purpose. The Football Association is no exception. The FA has been discussing a review of the organisation, including its structure and governance, since the spring of 2004. The events of the summer have underlined the need for a review, and the board and council are committed to one headed by an independent person, who will want to take a view on when they will be able to report. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to the FA in August this year, and I have been in regular contact with the FA during this time.

Andy Burnham: I think that my right hon. Friend the Minister must have gone for extra time on this question.

Is it not the clearest sign that the Football Association desperately needs reform that supporters have no voice on its council yet a place can be found for Cambridge and Oxford universities and the public schools? Does my hon. Friend share my concern of reports that talk of reform is being used by some of the big clubs to grab yet more power? Does he agree that that is the last thing that football in this country needs?

Mr. Caborn: Very much so. We must question why we have the Independent Football Commission. We must question also why we have an organisation for the fans. Further, we must ask why we have separate funding for grass-roots football through the foundation. Any review would consider the good regulation and governance of this important sport that is our national game. I hope and believe that the FA, within the terms of reference and given the person that it appoints, will bear that in mind. The FA will then be fit for purpose and will be a governing body of which we can all be proud.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Church Repairs

20. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If he will make a statement on the level of funding for church repairs in the current financial year. [194586]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): English Heritage and the Heritage Lottery Fund are making available £25 million for 2004–05 towards repair grants for listed places of worship of all faiths. This needs to be set against the £93 million spent in 2002 by the Church of England alone.

Miss McIntosh: Can the hon. Gentleman confirm newspaper reports that funding is insufficient to keep up with the repairs that are required?

Sir Stuart Bell: If I may quote the words of Aneurin Bevan, the reading of newspapers remains for me a source of "continuous fiction". I am not able to comment on that particular newspaper report.

If I may make a plug for my own constituency, we have Holy Trinity church, North Ormesby, where by way of church repairs we have a new multi-purpose church-run community centre. This has been a major catalyst for regeneration of the area. I was present when the Archbishop of York opened the centre. This is an example of what the hon. Lady supports for the rural communities that she represents, where she devotes a great deal of energy—more, I dare say than on the reading of newspapers.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend recognise that churches such as St. Peter's in the town centre of Burnley—an ancient church that is a focal part of the town—has had to find £65,000 recently to repair the pinnacles? It has been one thing after another. About £1 million has been spent over recent years. English Heritage rightly insists on certain conditions being maintained but is not able to assist with the finance for the essential repairs to be undertaken.

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his reference to his constituency and for drawing attention to the dilemma that we face, first, in repairing our churches and, secondly, in having them a part of a community. I refer him to the remarks of the Bishop of London in the other place on 25 October, and particularly to the statement of Lord McIntosh, when he said that the Government will respond positively to the Church Heritage Forum's report in due course. We accept a good deal of the analysis of the problem and many of the solutions. There is a problem in my hon. Friend's constituency and there is a solution, and that is to the benefit of his community.

Pensions

21. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): What assessment the Church Commissioners have made of the first report of the Pensions Commission; and if he will make a statement. [194587]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): The report is an authoritative analysis of a problem facing pensioners, the pensions industry and Government. The Church of England pensions board will discuss the report at its next meeting on 24 November.

David Taylor: Ministers of religion do not seek or receive the fame and fortune accorded to Ministers in government, so it is crucial that those called to lead our worship, our parishes and our communities at least receive decent treatment at the end of their working lives. Will my hon. Friend assure the House that the Church Commissioners will respond positively to the challenges and choices flagged up by the Turner report, so that potential priesthood recruits are not deterred by prospective poverty in retirement?

Sir Stuart Bell: My hon. Friend has made a valid and pertinent point. We are not here to discuss the pension rights of ministers of religion, but he will be aware of the Church's commitment to a defined benefit scheme, which is more generous than the money purchase schemes to which many employers are switching—in effect, money purchase schemes switch the risk to employees. I also remind my hon. Friend that the Pensions Commission's report does not offer detailed conclusions, and the final report is due in 12 to 18 months' time. On encouraging recruits to the priesthood, the numbers who have joined encourage us, and those recruits were not put off by the pension schemes for clergy on retirement.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): How many retired members of the clergy are dependent on means-tested benefits?

Sir Stuart Bell: The hon. Gentleman obviously reads the newspapers, where he can also read his own comments. I will be glad to give him an answer, if I can, and place it in the Library.

Westminster Abbey

22. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): When the builders' yard between Westminster abbey and St. Margaret's Westminster will be removed. [194589]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): The Dean and Chapter intend to proceed with removing the builders' yard and, as soon as practicable, landscape the area.

Mr. Gray: That answer is extraordinarily welcome, and I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for it.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION COMMITTEE

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission Committee, was asked—

Electoral Registration

23. Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): What recent steps the Electoral Commission has taken to bring about a higher level of electoral registration. [194590]

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): It is the duty of electoral registration officers to maintain the electoral registers, while the Electoral Commission has a statutory duty to promote public awareness. The commission directs pre-election reminders at the entire electorate and runs campaigns targeted at specific groups such as home movers, students and young people outside formal education. It also provides advice on the local promotion of electoral registration.

Mr. Lazarowicz: Although the way in which we register electors in this country does not have the same variety as in some other countries that we could mention, different local authorities approach electoral registration in different ways, which no doubt affects the number of people who are registered. Will the hon. Gentleman ask the commission to examine how to encourage local authorities to adopt best practice in order to ensure the highest possible level of registration? In particular, will he consider asking the commission to give guidance to local authorities on ensuring that they produce publicity and advertising material in all appropriate languages other than English?

Mr. Viggers: Yes; I understand that the commission operates in seven languages. The commission published a guidance manual in 2002 that suggested methods that registration officers could use to encourage registration, and it included a practical guide to planning and running a registration campaign. The commission continues to respond to requests from registration officers for advice in that area. In addition, the commission produces an annual canvass and other registration publicity materials, which are available on demand by registration officers.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): My hon. Friend is already aware of the alarming fall in the registration of men and women in the armed services caused by a change in rules by the Electoral Commission, which now requires servicemen to re-register annually. Does he consider it a disgrace, particularly at this time, that so many servicemen may find themselves without a vote at the next general election? What action has the Electoral Commission proposed to try to rectify that?

Mr. Viggers: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for identifying that important point. If I tell him that in the borough of Gosport the number of service-registered voters has fallen from 4,370 in 2000 to 474 in 2004, he will recognise that I personally share his concerns. Perhaps rather surprisingly, I am advised by the Electoral Commission that it has no direct powers to investigate the statistics. However, when I spoke to its chairman this morning, he told me that he will approach the Ministry of Defence with a view to working together to assess the extent of the problem of non-registration of service personnel and to consider what steps might appropriately be taken. The Ministry of Defence has confirmed that it is very much seized of the issue.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman bring the Electoral Commission's attention to several measures that I put before the House from 1993 onwards in an attempt to improve electoral registration, especially in terms of rolling registers? As we have a highly mobile society, registration should follow people around to ensure that they are on the register.

Mr. Viggers: There are currently no centrally held data on that in relation to Britain. In Northern Ireland, Electoral Commission research found that rolling registration resulted in an increase of 2.1 percentage points in the number of names on the register during the six-month period between December 2002 and May 2003. The commission's current research project on electoral registration in Britain will investigate the impact of rolling registration by using case-study evidence from a selection of local authorities. The project is expected to be completed by the spring or summer of 2005.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Cathedrals (Lottery Funding)

24. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What steps the commissioners are taking to ensure that adequate funding is made available from lottery funds to maintain the fabric of English cathedrals; and if he will make a statement. [194591]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall refer to the question of the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray). I am grateful for his reference to Westminster abbey, because that enables me to draw the House's attention to the tercentenary celebrations this Thursday. It is 300 years since the Church got its money back from the Crown, and this will be a worthy celebration.

In response to the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant), that is a matter for individual cathedrals and the Association of English Cathedrals.

Michael Fabricant: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that answer. However, does he share my surprise that the paper by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport—I am pleased to see the Secretary of State in her place—on culture and regeneration makes absolutely no mention of English cathedrals?

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that a recent Ecotec survey says that cathedrals generate in the order of £150 million each year in total local spend for their regional economies, yet only one eleventh of all the money available for the maintenance of the fabric of English cathedrals comes from lottery funds? Given that these are often listed buildings that are 900 or 1,000 years old, is not that rather inadequate?

Sir Stuart Bell: We should

"render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's".

I will leave it to the DCMS to respond appropriately to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question. On his second point, according to my information cathedrals generate at least £91 million a year for the national economy. They need to spend £11 million a year on repairs and maintenance, but from 2005 they will receive just £1 million a year in repair grant. If I may end with another quote from the Bible,

"Those who have ears will hear".

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): Given the nature of the crisis in funding across English cathedrals of all denominations, is the hon. Gentleman willing to convene a meeting with a Minister from the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, somebody from the Heritage Lottery Fund, and representatives of the cathedrals to assess and agree the cost of the work that needs to be done, and then to find a better means of raising the money to do it?

Sir Stuart Bell: I would be happy to take up the hon. Gentleman's suggestion and to include him in any meeting.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION COMMITTEE

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee of the Electoral Commission Committee, was asked—

Electoral Registration

25. Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): What study the Electoral Commission has made of the feasibility of introducing a single harmonised national electoral register. [194592]

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): The commission reported last year that electoral registers should continue to be compiled and managed locally but should form part of an electronically maintained national register. To date, it has not undertaken any study of the feasibility of introducing a single harmonised national electoral register.

Chris Bryant: One of the difficulties is that, because different parts of the country manage the electoral register in very different ways and are sometimes susceptible to the vagaries of local party politics, we end up with an electoral register that is very unreliable in many areas. Moreover, because many people move much more frequently than they used to, some accidentally or deliberately appear on the register at two different addresses instead of just one. Would not it make far more sense to move swiftly towards a single harmonised register?

Mr. Viggers: That issue is very much in the mind of the Commission. I understand that it believes that creating a national version of the register based on local registers that comply with national data standards should help to ensure that voters' details are accurate and up to date. It would also help to underpin improvements to the registration and electoral systems. A national version of the register should also provide more efficient access to those individuals and organisations that are legally entitled to copies of the electoral register.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In proceedings on the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill last week, the Home Secretary said that he would make an announcement on Third Reading, and issued a press release to that effect. Third Reading never took place, however, owing to the incompetence of the business managers. In justifying his action, the Home Secretary alleged, at column 1542 of the Official Report of 27 October, that the Opposition had "filibustered". No such filibuster could possibly have taken place, however, since the House was voting during the time allocated for Third Reading. His allegation is also an attack on the authority of Madam Deputy Speaker, since any filibustering would have been ruled out of order under Standing Order No. 42. Will you therefore require the Home Secretary to apologise to Madam Deputy Speaker for his completely false allegation, and to apologise for his discourtesy to the House in making entirely false and mischievous allegations?

Mr. Speaker: I say to the right hon. Gentleman that it is not for me to bring a Minister here to apologise. I have looked at the events of that day, however, and discussed the matter with my deputies. If any hon. Member had been filibustering, the Chair would have pointed it out to the hon. Member concerned. The fact that it was not pointed out means that there was no filibustering.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As a champion of Back-Bench rights who enables us to do our job of holding the Executive to account, will you offer me some advice? You may have seen press reports last week that the Prime Minister was refusing to answer my questions, and those of other hon. Members, about the meetings that he has had with representatives of the international casino industry, as well as the domestic gaming industry. Many people in the domestic industry believe that the international industry has been given more favourable treatment. It is therefore relevant that we should know whom the Prime Minister has met, and that he should answer our questions on this matter. Surely there should be some independent adjudication as to which questions the Prime Minister should answer. Will you help me, through your good offices or perhaps those of the Cabinet Secretary, to ascertain who decides which questions the Prime Minister should answer?

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can reply to the hon. Lady first. I am very pleased that she regards me as a champion of the Back Benchers. It is nice to have a vote of confidence now and again. I would say to her, however, that we are debating the Second Reading of the Gambling Bill today, and she can take these matters up during the course of that debate if she is lucky enough to catch my eye. Does that answer help the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray)?

Mr. Gray: More or less, Mr. Speaker, but further to that point of order, I understand that, on Friday last week, the lawyers in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and Labour party political advisers were seeking legal methods of avoiding answering questions tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) and me on this important subject. This morning, however, in the No. 10 briefing, the Prime Minister has answered those questions. He told the press that he had not had meetings with representatives of the gambling industry. Surely it is very strange to go to great lengths to avoid my hon. Friend's and my questions, and then to answer them straightforwardly in the press briefing this morning.

Mr. Speaker: I would not know anything about Labour party officials: I do not belong to the Labour party. I reiterate that the debate is about to start, and the hon. Gentleman may well have an opportunity to catch my eye.

Orders of the Day

Gambling Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I should inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

3.34 pm

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I know that passions are running high about this Bill, both in the House and outside. But I hope that our debate can be based on the facts, on concern for the public interest, and nothing else. The Bill addresses a subject that has not been properly scrutinised for more than 40 years, because of the policy of previous Administrations, which, where gambling was concerned, was to sidestep the big issues and be content to tinker. That is a luxury that we can no longer afford. We need to address the challenges that are caused by new technology, by the internet and by the steady growth in consumer demand. We need to keep gambling crime-free by giving regulators new powers and new duties. We need to make sure that our desire to give adults freedom to gamble if they wish is not at the cost of children or the vulnerable.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): It might be helpful if the Secretary of State were to tell us clearly whether this Bill, as it is now, was in this Government's manifesto.

Tessa Jowell: Certainly, we undertook in the Queen's Speech to publish a draft gambling Bill.

The proposals contained in the Bill have been developed over a five-year period—I cannot recall whether the proposals were in the manifesto, because work on developing the proposals started in the previous Parliament, when this was the responsibility of the Home Secretary—beginning with Sir Alan Budd's review, and followed by a White Paper, a draft Bill considered by a Committee of both Houses, and the Bill today.

Until recently, there was cross-party consensus for reform led by the work of the Scrutiny Committee on the draft Bill, which was ably chaired by the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), to whom I would like to pay tribute. As is often the case, consensus in dealing with what is a difficult contemporary social issue was replaced by the opportunism of a passing bandwagon. If the House gives the Bill a Second Reading, every proposal will be considered on its merits in Committee. I give the House my assurance that I will give every consideration to suggestions from right hon. and hon. Members that are genuinely intended to improve the Bill.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): The right hon. Lady mentioned the vulnerable earlier. Will she explain why she characterised Labour Back Benchers, Opposition Members such as me, the hierarchy of the Catholic Church and the Salvation Army as snobbish, because we stood up for the vulnerable? How does she say that when that would mean that most of the historic Labour figures were snobbish because they too stood up for the vulnerable?

Tessa Jowell: Had that been what I said, it would have been deeply offensive, and I would have apologised for it. I respect entirely the fact that people, on ethical, religious and other grounds, are opposed to gambling. I did not describe people as snobs—I referred to a whiff of snobbery pervading this debate, which is quite different from the allegation that the right hon. Gentleman is making.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has found out over this weekend that there is never a shortage of do-gooders telling people how to spend their leisure time. No doubt she will hear more of that in the House today. Does she agree with me that the British people are intelligent and sophisticated enough to make their own choices about what they do with their cash and leisure time? I hope that the Bill gets its Second Reading today.

Tessa Jowell: I agree with my hon. Friend. Neither this debate nor the British people are served by the kind of patronising attitude that doubts people's ability to make choices about how to spend their marginal income or leisure time.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Tessa Jowell: No, I want to make some progress; I will then take further interventions.

Scrutiny has improved the Bill to date, and I want to make it absolutely clear that the Government will listen to the views of right hon. and hon. Members, particularly when they offer constructive proposals that contribute to, or strengthen, the Bill's three underlying objectives: to protect children and the vulnerable, to ensure that gambling is conducted in a fair and open way, and to keep gambling in this country crime-free.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con) rose—

Tessa Jowell: The key principle will be that of social responsibility—a condition that is the test of each element of the Bill.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): Is the Secretary of State aware that these days, children have access to the internet and, through computer games, to gratuitous violence in the most graphic sense, in the privacy of their own rooms? Does she really think that they will be protected by banning the penny arcade?

Tessa Jowell: We are not banning the penny arcade in this Bill and yes, we do have to address the risks that children face, but not by taking disproportionate action in respect of matters for which there is no evidence of harm.

Mr. Gibb: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Tessa Jowell: I will give way on that point.

Mr. Gibb: I am grateful to the right hon. Lady. Why does the Bill impose a maximum stake on family amusements such those that enable children to win a teddy bear by picking it up with a crane? In Bognor Regis, the stake for such machines is 30p a go; if a 10p maximum is imposed, such amusements will be rendered unviable. Will she look again at this provision, so that the Bill does not have the unintended consequence of bankrupting family amusement arcades in seaside towns, only for them to be replaced by hard gambling outlets?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make a speech.

Tessa Jowell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I ask the hon. Gentleman to contain the impatience that he expressed solely on behalf of Bognor Regis; he will hear reassuring words from me later.

I recognise that gambling is a controversial, difficult and complex matter. That was true when betting shops were legalised, it was true when the Conservatives introduced the national lottery and the associated multi-million pound jackpots 10 years ago, and it is certainly true now. There are some people in this country—including, indeed, Members in all parts of the House, as I have said—who have a sincere and profoundly held objection to gambling. They would rather that gambling did not take place at all, and they certainly do not think that the state should sanction it. They may take this view for ethical, philosophical or religious reasons, or even because of family or personal experience, and I completely understand and respect it.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con) rose—

Tessa Jowell: There are other people who do not have a fundamental objection to gambling, but who choose not to gamble themselves and are happy for others to have the freedom to do so, provided that certain safeguards are in place to ensure that children and vulnerable adults are properly protected. That happens to be the view that I share.

There is a further group of people who do gamble. For them, it is just part of life—a source of enjoyment and a freedom that they value. Yes, they want safeguards to be in place, but they regard gambling as an activity in respect of which the restrictions should be kept to a minimum.

Bob Russell rose—

Tessa Jowell: Judged by their behaviour, this group is perhaps the largest of the three. Each year, some 4 million people visit the country's 700 bingo clubs. Each month, an estimated 4 million Britons log on to a gambling website. Each week, more than 1 million people bet on horse races. Last year, visitors to casinos staked £4 billion. If the national lottery is included, 70 per cent. of the population gamble regularly.

Several hon. Members rose—

Tessa Jowell: So views on gambling vary enormously, and the purpose of this Second Reading debate is to allow those views to be heard.

The House should recognise, however, that gambling is at the boundary between personal freedom and state intervention. On one side of the boundary is the reasonable expectation of adults who, within the law, exercise their right to live their lives as they choose. On the other is the role of the state: to recognise human frailty, and in particular to respect its duty to protect children and the vulnerable. As a Government and a society, we have three options in that respect: prohibition, a free-for-all or regulation. We have no doubt about choosing the regulatory route. The question for the House is how best to apply the regulatory framework for the benefit of society as a whole.

Bob Russell: Can I ask the right hon. Lady how many residents of Dulwich and West Norwood have asked her to provide that part of London with a super-casino?

Tessa Jowell: As of yet, the provisions governing super-casinos are not on the statute book. The hon. Gentleman may have encountered all sorts of wild speculation about planning permissions being granted or applied for, but not a single planning permission for a new casino under the new regime has yet been granted.

Donald Anderson (Swansea, East) (Lab): I do not know whether I fall into the category of an opportunist or a snob, but I would certainly accept do-gooder as the definition of someone who tries to do good in this matter. Do-gooders are certainly better than do-badders. Does my right hon. Friend not see the world of difference between ordinary folks who want to go to bingo halls and the proliferation of mega-casinos, which must be the intended effect of what she is proposing? Why cannot she have a few pilots in order to test her own views against what will happen in the real world?

Tessa Jowell: My right hon. Friend falls into the particular category of very talented and important Members of the House.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): Better than being a do-badder.

Tessa Jowell: My right hon. Friend did not expect a tribute. If proliferation were to be the consequence of these proposals, my right hon. Friend would have reason for concern, but if he will allow me to develop my argument, I hope to persuade him that his prediction will not, in fact, be realised. Let me just set out briefly how we reached this Bill—

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab) rose—

Tessa Jowell: I shall give way now, but then I want to make some progress.

Geraldine Smith: On children, clause 56 specifically states:

> "The Secretary of State may by order create an offence of inviting, causing or permitting a child or young person below a specified age to use a Category D gaming machine."

Are the Government seriously suggesting that a parent could be prosecuted for allowing her child to go into a seaside amusement arcade and roll a 10p piece down a shoot to win a cuddly toy? If so, it is the nanny state gone mad.

Tessa Jowell: If that were the case, my hon. Friend would be absolutely right that it would be an example of over-zealous and interventionist government. I shall explain at the appropriate point later in my remarks exactly why that provision sits in the Bill.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con) rose—

Tessa Jowell: I am not giving way yet.

Let me briefly recap how the Bill came about. New regulation is, by common consent, undoubtedly necessary. Every year and every week sees new developments in the gambling market, often in poorly regulated environments. The danger of the status quo lies not in more of the same, but in the current growth of poorly regulated gambling with little or no protection for those who play. Those who argue against the Bill cannot, if they are concerned about protection, defend the status quo.

We have recently seen roulette machines installed in betting offices against the wishes of the Gaming Board and similar machines proliferating in bingo halls and amusement centres. Since 1968 there have been many deregulatory measures affecting gambling. They have been brought forward on a piecemeal basis. That has been the problem. They included measures to allow the advertising of bingo, to allow betting offices to have clear windows and to increase the number of jackpot machines in casinos. Most came under the deregulation orders following the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994. We can all remember who was in power at that time.

The Lords deregulation Committee pointed out how unsatisfactory a piecemeal approach can be and initiated the process that led to the establishment of the gambling review body in the late 1990s, under the chairmanship of Sir Alan Budd. So the Bill is not a radical departure. It is a continuation of adapting to change since we last legislated for gambling 36 years ago, but this time, the Bill does so comprehensively rather than in fragments.

Part 1 of the Bill provides definitions, including the new licensing objectives that I have set out. Part 2 establishes the gambling commission, which will control commercial gambling to ensure that it is fair and safe. Parts 3 and 4 consolidate and modernise gambling offences. Part 4 concentrates on the new offences to protect children, which I know are of concern to the House. Parts 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9 set out the new licensing system to be administered by the gambling commission and local licensing authorities. The commission will take over the Gaming Board's responsibilities for casinos, bingo, gaming machines and the lottery.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State explain how the rules on licensing can be linked to planning arrangements, because one of the major fears of many Members, even those like me who support the introduction of the Bill and regional casinos, is that of proliferation? How will planning arrangements be linked to the excellent provisions on licensing in the Bill?

Tessa Jowell: I promise my hon. Friend, who I know has taken a great interest in this matter, that I will deal with it in some detail. I know that it is of such concern to Members to understand how the triple lock will operate in order to prevent the proliferation of new casinos.

The gambling commission will regulate through conditions on operating and personal licences, and for the first time, anybody who is licensed to run gambling premises will be obliged to pursue social responsibility as a condition of their operating licence. If operators breach the terms and conditions, they will face very tough sanctions. Unlike the Gaming Board, the new gambling commission will have the power to impose unlimited financial penalties on operators who breach their conditions. Local authorities will take on the licensing of premises under the guidance of the gambling commission. In Scotland, licensing boards will license premises.

Part 10 establishes a new regime for gaming machines that accommodates the developments in technology that have occurred since 1968. Part 11 provides for a new regime for charity lotteries. Parts 12, 13 and 14 deal with gambling that is small scale, incidental to other entertainment, or non-commercial. Part 15 provides new powers for effective inspection. Part 16 addresses advertising, and part 17 gambling debts. Lastly, part 18 deals with Bill-wide provisions.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): The right hon. Lady's Department said that the Bill would be revenue-neutral, implying a very substantial reduction in gambling duty. Although that statement was later slapped down, was the reduction in gambling duty discussed when the Labour party fundraiser Lord Levy met representatives of the international gambling industry?

Tessa Jowell: No, it was not. Secondly, the reference to revenue-neutrality was an error. It was a term in common use that was misunderstood. [Interruption.] Let me explain. The point being made was that revenue is not a motivator for this legislation. It is my job as Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport to establish the regulatory framework; it is the Treasury's responsibility to establish the taxation regime. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] Precisely. The taxation regime will follow once the regulatory regime is in place. I do not think that anything has changed very much on that front in the past seven and a half years.

To reduce the risk of harm, the Bill provides new powers to regulate the way in which gambling is offered. Our controls are currently limited to specifying what can be offered and where that can happen. The Bill will give us powers to change the way in which gambling is offered to avoid harm.

We have a low level of problem gambling in Britain. Approximately 0.6 to 0.8 per cent. of adults report the types of behaviour that are associated with problem gambling. However, for them, gambling can be a dangerous and destructive addiction. It can ruin the lives and livelihoods not only of gamblers but of their families. As with other forms of addiction to legal activities, we have to balance carefully the citizen's right to act freely with the state's duty to minimise harm and warn of the risks.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): The problem of dealing with internet gambling and those who have become addicted through it is an example of risk that falls outside much of the scope of the Bill. What discussions has my right hon. Friend held with credit card and escrow companies to try to tackle that difficult subject?

Tessa Jowell: As we make online gambling legal for the first time in this country, my hon. Friend will welcome provisions that allow offshore sites to return to this country to operate in a proper regulatory framework that protects both the interests of individual players and ensures that children cannot play on the internet. It also takes precautions in relation to the credit risk, about which my hon. Friend expressed concern.

Tessa Jowell: I want to make progress.

There is a parallel between alcohol and gambling. Both are legal pursuits, both carry an associated risk of addiction and the state has chosen not to proscribe but to shape supply. The Bill gives Ministers and the commission the power to respond to new risks, increase controls and avoid harm. We will get evidence, through a substantially increased programme of genuinely new research, which has already started. A national gambling audit will take place every three years. The first will happen before the Bill takes effect.

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): I have been reflecting on the right hon. Lady's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers). Is she telling hon. Members that she wants the Bill on the statute book before any information is released about inducements that the Government may have offered to mega-casino owners?

Tessa Jowell: No inducements have been offered to mega-casinos. We will get the measure on the statute book because millions of people are at risk unless that happens.

Several hon. Members rose—

Tessa Jowell: I shall not give way. [Interruption].

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State is not giving way.

Tessa Jowell: Just as there will be a baseline against which we can judge the impact of all our reforms, there will be not one but two further gambling studies before we even consider any calls for further relaxation of the new regime. We shall thus have a proper baseline, which tells us how many people gamble, and against which we can monitor closely, through the gambling commission, the impact of any of the changes. If evidence of harm emerges through the research and monitoring that is undertaken, we will act swiftly to toughen the controls.

We have powers throughout the Bill to withdraw or move back from the liberalisation if there is evidence of harm.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Tessa Jowell: No, I must make progress.

Much of the comment on the Bill claimed that the country wanted no more gambling and no more casino games. Although I respect the views of those who wish that demand did not exist, I ask hon. Members to examine the evidence. Many hon. Members know about the growing popularity of roulette machines in betting offices. From none two or three years ago, there are now more than 20,000, and the number continues to rise. As I have said before, the machines are on probation. Under the Bill, they will be under effective legislative control for the first time.

I suspect that all Members will have seen the countless advertisements for internet casinos and for poker rooms. Companies that conduct research into the internet estimate that some 16 per cent. of Britons visit an internet gambling site every month. Three years ago, 250,000 British people travelled to Las Vegas; next year, that is likely to double to 500,000.

What is more, many of the problems that we have faced over the past few years have arisen because gambling companies have been trying to install casino games on non-casino premises such as betting offices, bingo halls and amusement arcades. Anyone passing a betting office in the high street today is likely to see a huge poster inviting them to bet roulette. They are just as likely to see that as to see a picture of a horse. The industry is doing all that it can to get roulette into the high street, because wherever it succeeds in doing so roulette proves very popular.

Some, I accept, would react to that evidence by suggesting that we prohibit such choices; but if we have learnt anything at all about the history of regulating gambling, it is that if the law does not allow people to gamble safely, they will find ways of gambling at higher risk. We do not want to drive gambling underground or offshore. Expenditure on gambling is rising by about 3.5 per cent. each year, and it is predicted that that rate of increase will continue, with or without the Bill. People will go on choosing casino games whether we like it or not; the question for us is, how do we direct that demand?

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): There is a saying in Wales: three attempts and she might hear.

There is currently a requirement for an unstimulated demand test to be met before new casinos can be approved. I understand that the Bill would scrap that. Does my right hon. Friend agree that such action would make it more difficult for local planning authorities to reject huge casino applications?

Tessa Jowell: That was a timely intervention, as I am about to deal with the role of casinos in the Bill—in the context of a clear undertaking that there will be no new casinos if local people do not want them. I want to explain what is in the Bill, how we intend to achieve our aims, and how rigorous the safeguards are.

The Bill will certainly remove some of the more outdated restrictions on casinos. It will abolish the permitted areas that limit casinos to 53 former county boroughs, including those that had populations of 125,000 or more between December 1970 and October 1973. That explains why, believe it or not, it is possible to have a casino in Mayfair but not in Greenwich. The Bill will also abolish the membership rules requiring a 24-hour wait between joining a casino and playing games.

We consider it reasonable for British consumers to be allowed access to casino games on properly regulated casino premises. We would rather people gambled on machines in the carefully controlled environment of a casino than on dodgy internet sites at home. Our strategy, however, is intended to avoid the mistakes made by other countries such as Australia, which allowed a widespread proliferation of high-price machine gambling in the high streets. What we propose for the casino industry in Great Britain is a restrained modernisation that protects the public from problem gambling.

Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): My right hon. Friend mentioned my borough, Greenwich. Several planning authorities in the Thames gateway area may be attracted to the idea of having a casino; what is the best way of deciding which should have planning permission? [Laughter.] I think we should treat the issue a bit more seriously.

How do we decide whether regional planning priorities should determine where a casino goes, or whether it should be a matter for the local planning authority? Should there not be a national criterion enabling us to designate an area suitable? The local authority would have to demonstrate that it had consulted local people and referred to both its own unitary development plan and the regional development plan, and had received support, before it could proceed to the next phase and develop a casino?

Tessa Jowell: My hon. Friend makes a full and important intervention, but if he will bear with me I will answer his very good points in due course.

Sir Alan Budd, in his review, recommended a minimum customer area for new casinos of approximately 200 sq m to discourage too many small casinos. However, the Government have decided that the minimum size should be considerably larger—over three times larger—at 750 sq m. The net effect will be fewer new casinos than Sir Alan proposed, and only the largest casinos, with a minimum area of 5,000 sq m, will be entitled to house the new style machines. We will cap machine numbers in all casinos, and we will keep the present £2,000 prize limit for the two smaller categories of casino.

A number of casino operators have announced proposals for new leisure developments in different parts of the country, although the figures given in some newspapers for new regional casinos are wildly off the mark. Of course, these are all just proposals; almost none of them has gambling licences or planning permission. If the developments go ahead on the scale envisaged, they will no doubt bring significant economic and employment benefits to the areas in which they are located. For instance, the company that proposes a £125 million development on disused land in a regeneration area will, if it is approved, provide a host of new leisure facilities, of which a casino would be a relatively small component. Overall, the development would provide hundreds of construction jobs, employ over 1,000 staff and provide significant support to Leeds United football club.

Let me set out clearly for the House the very tight framework within which such new casinos will be allowed. I have spoken before about the triple lock that applies, and I want to explain each step in turn. I am very aware that there are calls from some quarters for a national cap on the number of the new regional casinos. The Joint Committee looked carefully at the issue and did not recommend a cap. I share the objective that regional casinos should be relatively few in number, but I do think that a cap may be a blunt instrument. My preferred alternative is for tough planning and licensing tests that may well be difficult for a number of proposals to pass, but do allow some flexibility for local communities. I am dirigiste only about the ends, not the means, and all sides agree that this cannot be left purely to the market, so let me set out how the regime would work.

The first lock is the operating licensing system. Anybody who wishes to operate a casino in the UK must apply to the gambling commission for an operating licence. Applicants will be rigorously tested to ensure that they measure up to the three statutory objectives in the Bill: to protect children and vulnerable adults, to keep gambling crime free and to ensure fair play for consumers. The gambling commissions's job of assessing licence applications will not be a question of ticking a box. Each and every application will have to go through careful and rigorous consideration.

The second lock is the premises licensing system, for which local authorities will be responsible. The Bill requires every local authority to have a gambling licensing policy that covers all gambling and betting premises, including casinos, and it empowers local authorities to consult the public on their licensing policy, including the casino element of it.

I understand the concerns that right hon. and hon. Members have expressed about local authorities finding the development benefits too tempting, so I will listen closely to the argument that the power to consult on the licensing policy should be replaced with a duty. That duty is already implicit in the planning procedures, but I am happy to consider making it more explicit. At this point, or at any time it chooses, a local authority may resolve, under clause 157, not to allow any new casinos in its area. It has a wide discretion to exercise that power, and in deciding whether to exercise it, it may have regard to "any principle or matter", and the power lasts for three years and is renewable. The Joint Committee did not recommend the power of resolution. I decided to add it to the Bill because I wanted local authorities that do not want new casinos to be able to say so clearly and categorically, and to be protected from any of the risks that might follow.

[Tessa Jowell]

The Bill allows any local authority to impose a blanket ban on new casino development, and I am sure that the House will support that, but even if an authority does not decide to apply such a ban it still has strong powers to reject a specific application for a casino development, whether large, small, or regional. Local authorities can and must test any application for a premises licence against the three licensing criteria in the Bill and can refuse any application that does not meet them.

Mr. Bercow: I understand the triple lock, and I see what the right hon. Lady means by her preferred alternative, but surely there is something to be said for a backstop position. Given that she envisages only between 20 and 40 super-casinos but that her critics predict a very much larger number, I put it to her that introducing a limit in the Bill on the total number, as well as being right in itself, would help to facilitate the smooth passage of this important Bill, which in other respects she is entirely right to champion.

Tessa Jowell: I know that there will be a lot of discussion about this aspect of the proposals both here and, if the Bill secures a Second Reading, in Committee. The practical obstacle created by a cap is that the whole thrust of the regulatory and planning system is to leave decisions about new casinos to local people, but if an arbitrary limit is imposed, what do we say to those local authorities—there may be a significant number—that present applications for new casinos just as the cap is about to be reached, and—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House must come to order and allow the right hon. Lady to speak.

Tessa Jowell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am trying to explain what I believe is one of the issues of contention at the heart of the Bill, and it is important that, if hon. Members raise concerns about it, they should listen to the answer. This is not the end of the story, and I expect further discussion in Committee.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend ensure that there is no appeal against the veto on super-casinos that she is giving to local authorities; otherwise, authorities will be overruled, will they not, by the Secretary of State?

Tessa Jowell: As the provisions stand, there is no appeal against the provisions in clause 157, but my right hon. Friend may wish to return to this point at another time.

Several hon. Members rose—

Tessa Jowell: I intend to make some progress by returning to the licensing and planning regime.

If a casino application was considered to be too close to, for instance, a residential area or a school, it could be refused on the social responsibility criteria in clause 1. That is the case even before the planning regime and the third lock become effective.

The planning system is crucial. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and his Department for working so closely with me and my Department on the interaction of licensing and planning policy. He and I are happy to give the House a firm undertaking that the licensing and planning regimes will be fully aligned to ensure that the Bill is implemented in a cautious and responsible way that respects the wishes of local authorities and local communities. The Deputy Prime Minister and I will make sure that detailed advice is available about the transition period.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): What the Secretary of State is saying is helpful to the House, but what is the Government's current thinking on the Joint Committee's recommendation that there should be a separate planning use class for regional casinos?

Tessa Jowell: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I shall have more to say about that.

As Secretary of State, I have the power to commence the Bill in such a way that the gambling commission is got up and running and there is reasonable time to put in place appropriate local and regional planning frameworks before premises licence applications are made, and that is what I shall do. For regional casinos, we will make sure, under the provisions of the new planning regime, that regional spatial strategies are updated to take account of the Bill. Regional authorities will be able to analyse the best locations for regional casinos from the point of view of economic growth, tourism promotion and regional sustainability, as well as existing regional development plans.

Regional authorities will identify broad locations for regional casinos, but the local authority—the licensing authority—will have the final say, assuming that it has not already exercised its right to ban all new casinos in its area under clause 157. We will also make sure, for small and large casinos, that local development frameworks are updated to take account of the Bill, again assuming that a local authority has not imposed a blanket ban. All the usual safeguards and protections in planning law will be available to local authorities and local communities. Local communities will be consulted about any planning application for a new casino. They will make their views known, and there will be a public debate.

Some Members and, as the hon. Member for Ryedale said, the Joint Committee, have expressed concern that some casinos may bypass the planning system because of the absence of a separate use class for casinos in planning law. The current law theoretically allows any leisure facility, such as a swimming pool or cinema, to be converted into a casino without triggering planning controls, although, obviously, a premises licence—therefore, the planning regime—would be invoked. After the Joint Committee's second report, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister undertook to review the possibility of a new use class for casinos and invited comments by the end of October. I am delighted to announce today that he and I have agreed in principle to require change of use to a casino to be subject to planning control. Subject to further detailed consideration of the outcome of the review and the usual consultation, we are minded to amend the use class order.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Given that planning in Scotland is, of course, devolved to the Scottish Parliament and Scottish Executive, has my right hon. Friend had discussions with Scottish Ministers to ensure that similar planning protection is given to local authorities and communities there, and will she make sure that the Bill does not come into effect in Scotland until such changes are made in the relevant Scottish legislation?

Tessa Jowell: I assure my hon. Friend that there have been ongoing discussions with Scottish Ministers as the policy has developed, and that those discussions will continue.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I suspect that there will be pleasure in all parts of the House at the news that the Secretary of State just announced. Will she confirm that what she is announcing is a separate use category for all casinos, not just for the super-casinos?

Tessa Jowell: Yes, I can confirm that.

Subject to further consultation, the process will proceed. I assure the House that the establishment of a separate use class is evidence that the Government do not want casinos to be allowed in by the back door. We aim to ensure that new casinos are taken forward through the development of the plan-making process.

That is the triple lock that we are putting in place for casinos. The system is robust and will, I hope, reassure the House and concerned communities throughout the UK that there will be no proliferation of casinos, whether small, large or regional. The system will allow local communities to ban all casinos or to reject specific casino plans that do not measure up to the social responsibility criteria in clause 1 or the requirements of planning law.

The nature of the new system is precisely why most economic and industry analysts expect the British market to be able to sustain only between 20 and 40 regional casinos. They have reached that conclusion because the policy that we have designed is so stringent and because they do not think that demand will be any higher. If demand is lower than analysts expected, there will be even fewer than 20 to 40 regional casinos.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has been generous in giving way. She mentioned that research indicates that the market will bear only up to 40 super-casinos. In that case, will she explain why having a cap in the Bill is undesirable? I would suggest that having one would be very desirable.

Tessa Jowell: Because there is a difference between a cap set by Government and the range of the likely levels of development set by industry forecasts based on the regulatory framework that the Government are establishing and the three elements of that regulatory system that I have set out.

Tessa Jowell: I am aware that many hon. Members wish to speak in the debate, so, although I have taken many interventions, I now intend to make progress.

There will be three opportunities for consultation, two of which, on the licensing policy and on planning permission, will be obligatory. There will also be the opportunity to consult on the possible use of the resolution.

I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will regard the framework as well considered and robust. I assure hon. Members that on every aspect of the Bill the Government are listening and are open to proposals that will improve the protections in it. If hon. Members have suggestions about how the triple lock can be strengthened, proposals will be carefully examined at later stages.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab) rose—

Tessa Jowell: Perhaps my hon. Friend did not hear that I was referring to the later stages of considering ways to strengthen the Bill.

Mr. Prentice: The Government have told the Joint Committee:

> "These unlimited prize machines are new to the UK, and there is no reliable evidence as to the impact of these machines."

Surely that is a classic case for having some pilot casinos, so that we can test the impact of such fantastically large pay-outs.

Tessa Jowell: That is precisely why we rejected the recommendations of the Budd review, which would have introduced high-value, high-prize machines everywhere. That is also why we rejected the recommendation of the Joint Committee, which would have meant introducing such machines in all casinos, and why we are limiting them to regional casinos. I should also make clear, for my hon. Friend's information, that the way in which such machines operate and are manufactured—their design—will be subject to the oversight and scrutiny of the gambling commission. They may come from any part of the world, but they will have to conform to the British regulatory system. We will also monitor very closely any evidence that the availability of these machines is leading to an increase in problem gambling, in which case we will take action through the gambling commission to address the matter.

Several hon. Members rose—

Tessa Jowell: I shall not take any more interventions.

I should like to move on quickly to protections for children; I know that the House attaches great importance to keeping children away from harmful gambling. Children should never get involved with gambling that will harm them.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State has stated that she will not be giving way.

Tessa Jowell: That is in respect of the many hon. Members who wish to speak in the debate.

[Tessa Jowell]

There is no more important area to keep children away from harm than the internet. The evidence published over the summer that some British companies were failing in this area is profoundly disturbing. Any internet operator seeking a licence from the gambling commission will need to demonstrate precisely how it intends to exclude children from play.

I want to say a few words about our approach to the lowest-prize gaming machines, which children can use. These machines are found in leisure sites such as seaside fairs and funfairs, but they are also available in a wide range of premises such as fish and chip shops and taxicab offices. I have received many representations from those who disagree with children being allowed to use gaming machines at all, and I have sympathy with those who observe that Britain is unusual in allowing children to play on any category of slot machine, but I think that it would be wrong of the Government to ignore the fact that children have been permitted to use amusement machines for many decades without clear evidence of an impact on the level of problem gambling among children.

Such amusement machines have also been a traditional and well-loved part of the family leisure and seaside experience. We have not yet seen sufficiently compelling evidence to ban children from using these machines altogether. I know that the Joint Committee considered this matter very carefully and also reached that view. We must remain vigilant and cautious in relation to future risks, so I assure the House that on this issue and every other aspect of the Bill I will listen very carefully to the views of hon. Members.

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way. In the context of the many seaside communities around the country, is it not her experience, as it is mine and that of many hon. Members who represent those communities, that the family businesses that run such arcades have a high level of enforcement and make an important contribution to measures to stop antisocial behaviour at the seaside? Is that not the higher standard that we are trying to achieve in this Bill?

Tessa Jowell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is because those high standards of supervision are exercised in so many of these arcades that the evidence of problem gambling among children has not been produced. We want that vigilance to increase. That is why there is a reserve power in the Bill to be used should evidence of problems arise some time in the future, but as my hon. Friend made clear—I know that many hon. Members with constituency interests have found this—by and large, the regime in seaside arcades and family entertainment centres is very responsible. By withdrawing category D machines, as they are called, from fish and chip shops and minicab offices, we deal with the risks of ambient gambling and of exposing children to gambling.

Let me move to a conclusion. Gambling is a legitimate industry that requires fair and proportionate regulation. It is an industry where the freedom to operate is important, but only when the public are properly protected. The Bill will protect the public at a time when technology threatens to overwhelm us with new, poorly regulated gambling opportunities. It provides vital new powers to protect children and put an end to socially irresponsible practices. It puts Parliament and the regulators back in control, with the power to toughen controls and the evidence on which to act. Crucially, it puts power firmly in the hands of local communities. New casinos will come to their area only if they want them—full stop.

The Government know that adults should be allowed to exercise their personal freedom, that vulnerable people must be protected and that everyone should be protected from the unregulated consequences of the free market in an area such as gambling. We have always recognised that opinion on gambling cuts across normal party political divides. That is why we have sought to continue the long practice of the House of developing policy in an open and, where possible, a non-partisan way.

That is why we welcomed many of the recommendations of the Joint Committee chaired so ably by the hon. Member for Ryedale. It is why we agree with the Leader of the Opposition when as Home Secretary, rather than as Leader of the Opposition jumping on the opportunistic bandwagon, he announced plans to free casinos and bingo halls from outdated and restrictive rules. It is why we agreed with the words of the then junior Home Office Minister responsible for gambling when he asked, "Why should we stop people choosing to spend their evenings playing roulette?" It is why we understood the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson), the Opposition spokesman on culture, when in his day job as editor of The Spectator he wrote—I paraphrase: "Opposition to the Gambling Bill is nothing but low protectionism and in the case of the Daily Mail, a knee-jerk reaction to absolutely anything the Government does, dressed up as moral principle".

The Government have approached the Bill with a determination to do what is best for the British public. The Bill will protect the weak and the vulnerable. It will give the United Kingdom the most modern and the toughest regulatory regime for gambling anywhere in the world. For those reasons I commend the Bill to the House.

4.32 pm

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford): I beg to move, To leave out from 'That' to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to the Gambling Bill since it fails to take account of the recommendations of the Joint Committee on the Draft Bill with regard to regional casinos; consequently fails to impose adequate controls on the number and location of such casinos and on the number and type of gambling machines contained; does not give local authorities sufficient powers to reject specific casino applications; opens the door to an influx of overseas-owned super casinos in our towns and cities, close to where people live; and is likely to promote gambling and lead to further diversion of funds from the National Lottery, severe disadvantage to the existing UK gaming industry and a significant increase in problem gambling."

May I begin by expressing our appreciation to the Secretary of State for her coming to the House to move the Second Reading? We are aware that she suffered a family bereavement recently and it is very good of her to be here this afternoon.

As the Secretary of State suggested, the Bill has been a very long time in its gestation. It originates from the Budd report, which was published some three years ago, and since then there has been a huge amount of debate, scrutiny and consultation. I join the right hon. Lady in paying tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway). He and his Committee did a fantastic job in taking evidence from every possible interest group affected by the Bill, and there is no doubt that the Bill was much improved by his work. Indeed, it would be an even better Bill if the Government had chosen to accept all the Committee's recommendations.

Given all the attention that the Bill has had over the past three years, it is extraordinary that at this eleventh hour the Secretary of State had to come to the House this afternoon to announce last-minute concessions so that she might be able to persuade some on her own side to give it their support in the vote this evening.

Mr. Tony Banks (West Ham) (Lab): Of course, if my right hon. Friend had not made any announcements, the hon. Gentleman would accuse her of being arrogant and insensitive to opinion, so she cannot win in either case. In view of the announcements that she made during her Second Reading speech, do the Government intend to withdraw their amendment opposing Second Reading?

Mr. Whittingdale: The hon. Gentleman is a little premature. We are not quite in Government yet. It is true that the Secretary of State has announced some concessions that we welcome, but there are still major points of concern that she has not addressed, which are spelled out in our amendment. The right hon. Lady has said that she is in listening mode. We hope that she will continue to listen during the debate and when we consider the Bill in Committee. There are still major flaws in the Bill.

Until now, the history of gambling regulation has been one of gradual and cautious liberalisation. For 30 years, the UK industry has been a model of responsibility. It has been largely free of organised criminal activity and the level of problem gambling is much lower in this country than elsewhere. It was for that reason that the previous Conservative Government felt able to introduce measures to liberalise the rules.

In 1994, the waiting period for membership of casinos was reduced from 48 hours to 24 hours and casinos were allowed to apply to serve alcohol after midnight and to accept debit cards, but not credit cards. Two years later, the Home Office issued a consultation paper on proposals to allow limited local advertising and to extend the number of permitted areas for casinos to 21, in order for them to be allowed to be established in some seaside resorts and conference towns. I point out to the Secretary of State, in response to her remarks at the end of her speech, that the Government said specifically at that time that there was a need to maintain tight control of casino gaming and that they did not support allowing resort-style casinos in this country.

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman acknowledges that the Conservative Government accepted a proposal to allow 21 more casinos in 1996–97. Thankfully, that was stopped by the Labour Government when they took office. Does he agree that the Conservative proposal for new casinos was to be achieved through deregulation, whereas this Bill is primary legislation? The Conservative proposal would have been legislation through the back door, rather than constructive consultation within the industry.

Mr. Whittingdale: The measures to which I referred, which were implemented by the previous Conservative Government, were subject to enormous consultation. They represented a modest step forward. We are faced today not with a modest step forward but with a massive change that will completely alter the nature of gambling in this country. The hon. Gentleman refers to the industry having been consulted. The industry is deeply unhappy with many of the recommendations and feels, in particular, that the new rules suddenly announced in response to the second report of the Scrutiny Committee were subject to no consultation whatsoever.

There is much in the Bill that we support. There is no doubt that during the past seven years a huge change has taken place. In particular, there has been the growth of interactive and online gambling, which is completely unregulated. We therefore agree that the time has come for gambling legislation to be overhauled and brought up to date.

We welcome the establishment of the gambling commission as a new unified regulator for betting, gaming and lotteries. However, the reported decision to locate the headquarters of the commission in Newcastle has led to complaints that it will be far away from the industry that it is regulating. I understand that the chairman of the Gaming Board for Great Britain has attacked the proposal. I would be grateful if the Secretary of State would confirm whether that is the case.

We welcome the creation of the new offence of inviting, permitting or causing a child to gamble, as well as the action taken by the industry to establish a responsibility—

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman has got against Newcastle. I can say, as a former councillor, that it is a fine city with at least three casinos, two of which were established under the Tyne and Wear development corporation, an invention of the previous Conservative Government.

Mr. Whittingdale: The concern of the chairman of the Gaming Board is that very few of the existing members of the board will want to transfer to Newcastle. That is a serious concern.

An area where regulation is most urgently needed is that of remote gaming. Gambling on the internet has become a huge business in the space of a few years, and it is predicted that the industry will be worth £10 billion globally within the next five years. At present, such gambling can take place only on websites hosted outside the UK—it is, of course, impossible to stop such gambling, as has been found in Australia and the United States, where they have tried to do so. Many offshore sites offer no player protection and few safeguards against under-age access or criminal activity. It therefore makes sense to have a licensed and regulated UK-based industry, where players can be certain that their bets will be honoured and that operators will be above board. We therefore support the provisions of the Bill dealing with remote gambling and agree that they must be enacted as soon as possible.

Other elements of the Bill concern us. The Government's attitude towards fixed-odds betting terminals remains uncertain. Will those machines be treated like other category B machines and allowed in adult gaming centres and bingo halls? Having listened to the Secretary of State's speech this afternoon, that concern will grow because she appeared unwilling to accept the agreement between the Association of British Bookmakers and the Gaming Board.

Equally, the point at which users of betting exchanges will be considered as conducting a business—which could potentially make them subject to licensing requirements—rather than as recreational users is still unclear. The bingo industry is also looking for reassurance that games currently permitted under section 21 of the Gaming Act 1968 will be allowed to continue. We will seek clarification on all those issues in Committee.

We also have reservations about the Government's decision to disallow the lowest stake category D machines from non-licensed premises such as fish and chip shops and minicab offices. Although the Joint Committee suggested that approach, little evidence exists that the existing arrangement has resulted in harm, yet the proposal will deprive many small businesses of an important source of revenue.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that the powers taken in the Bill effectively to drive out traditional, family seaside arcades make it impossible for those businesses to plan ahead? The contradiction between the highly restrictive powers at the small end of the market and liberalism at the heavy, casino end of the spectrum wrecks any attempt at fair-mindedness in the Bill. Will my hon. Friend go a little bit further in his determination to protect the traditional seaside arcade against an uncomprehending Government?

Mr. Whittingdale: My right hon. Friend speaks for many operators in seaside arcades and amusement centres who are deeply concerned about the powers in the Bill to prevent children from continuing to use machines such as penny-falls and cranes. The Secretary of State has said that the power will be reserved, but many people feel that there is no evidence that such machines have ever led to any harm. While that reserved power is in the Bill, such people will continue to believe that the Government will impose controls at a future date. I say to my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), my hon. Friend the Member for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds) and the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith), who have all raised the same point, that we continue to believe that that particular clause is unnecessary and that it should be removed.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): This morning, I went around a number of arcades in my constituency, including one in Hunstanton. I spent a certain amount of money playing with the crane machines and the pushing machines. I heard from the owners of that arcade that those machines do not corrupt; all those machines do is give a lot of amusement to young children, which is an historical tradition in seaside resorts. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government must make their plans clear because such arcades currently face a great deal of uncertainty?

Mr. Whittingdale: I agree with my hon. Friend and hope that he won a teddy bear from the crane. However, I do not think that the experience will have corrupted him or led him to gambling addiction. It is extraordinary that the Government appear determined to take powers to prevent children from using cranes and penny-fall machines, when they are prepared to open the door to huge regional casinos filled with up to 1,250 unlimited prize machines.

I come now to the most controversial issue—the measures further to liberalise the laws relating to casinos. Conservative Members accept that there is a case for a further relaxation in some aspects, such as restrictions on advertising, the confinement of casinos to permitted areas and the 24-hour delay before membership is granted. However, regional casinos of the kind proposed have never been seen before in this country—nor, until now, have we permitted the introduction of category A gaming machines. Those machines, which have unlimited stakes and prizes, have proved to be the biggest cause of problem gambling in Australia following the liberalisation that took place there, so it is absolutely essential to proceed cautiously in that respect.

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): Is it not the case that the relaxation of restrictions on casinos was included in the White Paper that was published in March, and that the March edition of "Conservative News" welcomed plans to liberalise the laws on gambling? What has changed since then?

Mr. Whittingdale: As I said, we are not opposed to liberalisation of the laws of gambling, but we believe that we need to proceed cautiously. The announcements that the Government have made since the publication of the Joint Committee report have given rise to our greatest concerns, because they show that in those areas the Government are clearly not proceeding cautiously.

Mr. Kevan Jones rose—

Tessa Jowell rose—

Mr. Whittingdale: I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Tessa Jowell rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman has given way to Kevan Jones.

Mr. Jones: In fact, the Government are proceeding cautiously, because the Bill will not liberalise high-jackpot machines, but will limit them to certain casinos— unlike in Australia, where things have gone wrong because of their unlimited use.

Mr. Whittingdale: The Bill takes us from a situation in which there are no such machines to one in which there may be 50,000. That is not, in my view, cautious liberalisation—[Interruption.] The Secretary of State asks where we get the figure of 50,000 from. She has said that there will be up to 40 regional casinos. There may be up to 1,250 machines in each of those, so that equals 50,000.

Tessa Jowell: It is absolutely essential that this debate is conducted on the basis of fact, not fantasy, myth and mistaken beliefs. The expectation is that about 10 per cent. of machines in regional casinos will be category A machines that do not have a specified stake or prize. If there is any evidence that they are causing harm, it will be for the gambling commission to reduce the stake and the prize. That deals with the hon. Gentleman's concerns. Whether in relation to this or to my very clear assurances on seaside arcades, it is important that he sticks to the facts instead of writing a novel.

Mr. Whittingdale: The fact is that regional casinos will be allowed up to 1,250 machines, which, as they can be of any category, could all be category A; it is not sufficient for the Secretary of State merely to say that her expectation is that they will not be. I hope that she will take seriously my suggestions on how further limits could be imposed.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): As my hon. Friend knows, I have been following these issues for many years. The Government have not accepted the concerns expressed by many people in the industry and on both sides of this House and in the upper House, as reflected in the excellent report by the Joint Committee chaired by our hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), that if the Government's proposals are proceeded with we will lose the regenerative effect of the casinos on some of our run-down resorts, whereas if the Committee's recommendations were accepted we could ensure that the regenerative effect occurs. Does my hon. Friend agree that the real problem is that the Government have ensured that there can be huge casinos in major cities, not only in resorts?

Mr. Whittingdale: My hon. Friend is absolutely right; I wish to deal with that point later.

I want to return to my point about the Government's original intention, which, as the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) suggested, appeared to be based on cautious liberalisation. We were first told that there would be a limited number of resort destination casinos and that they were so called because they would be located in seaside resorts and away from centres of population. Limiting the accessibility of jackpot machines was said at the time to be crucial to the Government's objective of protecting children and the vulnerable. However, the Government have been seduced by the prospect of the millions of pounds of investment being offered by the overseas operators who want to come and set up in this country. According to some of those companies to which I have spoken, they are willing to invest tens, if not hundreds, of millions of pounds in each one of the new mega-casinos; in doing so, they would provide thousands of jobs. Of course that is a tempting prospect, but those companies are not proposing to make that investment out of altruism. The return on their investment will come from the 20,000 people they are hoping to attract through the doors of each casino every week.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has had time to look at the report of the Culture, Media and Sport Committee, which looked at the original draft of the Gambling Bill some time before the Joint Committee, chaired by the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), produced its report. The Select Committee—which included several of the hon. Gentleman's Conservative colleagues, none of whom demurred for an instant at the time, although they are now doing so—listened to the Bishop of Blackburn putting very clearly the argument in favour of the regeneration of Blackpool. He wanted to see that financial investment being made. Does the hon. Gentleman think that the bishop has succumbed to temptation?

Mr. Whittingdale: I would say two things to the hon. Gentleman. First, the proposals on the table today are very different from those that were on the table when his Select Committee was examining the issue. Secondly, he cites the Bishop of Blackburn, but I hope that he is not suggesting that the Churches generally support the Bill. He only has to look at the remarks of a number of archbishops, and of representatives of the Methodist Church, the Salvation Army and many other religious groups, to see that they are bitterly opposed to many of the provisions in the Bill.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Does my hon. Friend accept that while the Bishop of Blackburn might want to see Blackpool being regenerated through the possibility of one resort casino being established there, that is a very different matter from splattering casinos around every major city and town in the United Kingdom? There are so many questions that need to be answered on the Bill, particularly in regard to the super-jackpot machines. If we were to pilot these new casinos in a small number of areas—perhaps Blackpool could be one—we could test their impact on the country.

Mr. Whittingdale: That very sensible suggestion has also been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow).

Miss Kirkbride: I think that the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) chose to misinterpret the conclusions reached by the Conservative members of the Select Committee, of whom I was one at the time to which he referred. The simple fact is that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) has said, establishing a resort destination casino in Blackpool while we test the market is one thing, but introducing casinos with category A gaming machines in 40 cities across the country is very different.

Mr. Whittingdale: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for setting out her position, and to the other Conservative members of the Committee. As several of my hon. Friends have suggested, the original hope that this proposal might lead to the regeneration of seaside resorts such as Blackpool will actually be undermined by the proposals before us, as there is no doubt that the operators of the casinos would much rather locate them in central Manchester or Liverpool, for example, than in Blackpool, if they had the opportunity to do so.

Mrs. Humble: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way, especially as he is talking about Blackpool. Does he believe that the regional casinos could lead to the regeneration of towns such as Blackpool? If so, will he tell me how his voting against this Second Reading would enable that to happen?

Mr. Whittingdale: We are concerned that the original intention to locate the casinos in seaside resorts and other places that need regeneration will be undermined by the shift in the Government's strategy towards locating them in centres of population. That is one of our deep concerns about the Bill, and one of the reasons why we cannot support it this evening.

Jim Knight: The logic seems to be that the Bill will receive its Second Reading tonight and that we shall then have an opportunity to improve it in Committee. If the hon. Gentleman supports the 90 per cent. of the Bill that is in favour of protecting people from gambling, I cannot understand why he is opposing it on Second Reading.

Mr. Whittingdale: If the hon. Gentleman reads the reasoned amendment that we have tabled, he will see that it sets out clearly why we cannot support the Bill tonight. As I conceded earlier, the Bill contains some proposals that we support, but at the moment, it is fatally flawed in several respects, and there is a real danger that it will lead to an increase in gambling addiction and will fail to provide the protection that the Government claim that it will provide for children and the vulnerable.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Does not my hon. Friend think it strange that the Government pray in aid the need for super-casinos to bring economic regeneration to many parts of the country when they might look instead to sports, film and arts venues, particularly for young people who are poorly served, if they really want to see such regeneration?

Mr. Whittingdale: I agree with my hon. Friend.

Why have the Government decided to throw caution to the wind, give up on the slow and gradual approach to liberalisation, and instead fling open the doors? The first indication that we had was that the new approach represents a pot of gold for the Treasury. The Secretary of State said this afternoon that her adviser's comment that the tax regime would be revenue-neutral had been somehow misunderstood. In fact, the Minister for Media and Heritage told a conference last year that a key aim of the Bill was to raise tax revenue for the Treasury. We also know that the parliamentary Labour party brief on the Bill states:

> "Parliamentary Labour Party members should bear in mind that some of the towns and cities that want to use a casino as part of a broader leisure, tourism and regeneration strategy are key Labour seats".

Those are the real reasons why the Government have abandoned their previous approach and are now desperate to get this Bill on the statute book before the next election.

The Secretary of State has said that she is prepared to listen to Members' concerns during the passage of the Bill. Many of our concerns, however, were identified by the all-party scrutiny Committee in its report in July. It proposed specific safeguards against proliferation, yet those were rejected by the Government. If the Secretary of State had listened at the time, many of the problems could have been averted. In particular, the scrutiny Committee proposed limiting the number of casinos by increasing the minimum non-gambling area from 1,500 to 4,000 sq m. Doing so would have helped to ensure that casinos were closer to leisure complexes offering a different range of attractions, rather than simply giant gambling dens. More importantly, it would have increased the size of total investment required, which in the Committee's view would have limited the likely number built to about 20 to 25.

The Secretary of State has said this afternoon that her proposals will result in 20 to 40 regional casinos being built. The truth is that the Bill does not provide for any upper limit, and as the Government's response to the scrutiny Committee states,

> "estimates of the number of regional casinos likely to be developed are necessarily speculative".

That is why Members on both sides of the House are saying that if the Secretary of State is proved wrong—by her admission in her report, she might be—there is a case for having some kind of cap on the figure so that we do not see a proliferation of such regional casinos, which are of a kind that we have never seen previously.

Rob Marris: In spite of the hon. Gentleman's reservations about other less controversial parts of the Bill, would he and his colleagues support the Bill if it included such a cap?

Mr. Whittingdale: That would be a considerable step forward, but the Secretary of State has already rejected it this afternoon, so it does not seem likely. I hope that the Secretary of State and Ministers will address several concerns in Committee. We will examine it when it comes back from Committee to see whether it is improved.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is not the number of casinos that matters? We all know that the vast majority of people can gamble without becoming addicted, but a small number become addicted and need help and support. Would it not be better for him to concentrate on, for example, controlling credit betting and ensuring that services are available to help the small number of people who would become addicted, regardless of the number of casinos, or of any other gambling establishments?

Mr. Whittingdale: There are steps that need to be taken, particularly to try to increase the protection available to those people, a point to which I shall return.

Mr. Bercow: This is, after all, a Second Reading debate on the Bill's general principles. Given that it seeks a balance between freedom and protection, that the Joint Committee said that there is no justification whatsoever for delaying its introduction, and that my hon. Friend has himself said that arcane and anomalous gambling laws are holding back our businesses, how does he answer the charge that a decision to oppose the Bill outright on Second Reading would represent not principled opposition, but political expediency?

Mr. Whittingdale: I answer that charge by saying that the Bill as drafted has got it wrong. The Government have had ample opportunity to build in the safeguards for which hon. Members from all parts of the House have been calling—in particular, those set out clearly in the report of my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale and his Committee. If the Government had been willing to listen then, the Bill would have been considerably better and more deserving of support. However, they were not willing to listen, which is why we are unable to support it this evening.

Chris Bryant: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Whittingdale: I will give way on the subject of caps.

Chris Bryant: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way; he is being very generous. Several hon. Members have argued that the Bill should include a cap on the number of super-casinos, but is that not illogical? Only if the Government or a central body decide the location of each super-casino can one impose a national cap. If we allow local and regional authorities to make those decisions, it is difficult to set a national cap.

Mr. Whittingdale: The Government have already said that regional planning bodies will play a key role in the process. It would be perfectly sensible to suggest an initial cap of, say, one or two casinos per region. It would then be for the regional planning bodies to decide where they should be located. That would represent co-operation between national Government and regional planning bodies, and it would be up to local authorities to determine particular sites. That seems a perfectly sensible way forward.

The Secretary of State laid great stress on the role of local authorities and their powers to reject casino developments. However, it is difficult to see a local authority resisting the temptation of the tax revenue and potential planning gain that an investment of this size could bring, especially if it takes the view that if it turned it down, the neighbouring authority would simply take the benefit instead.

Mr. Don Foster: Will the hon. Gentleman share with the House his views about whether planning circular 1/97 of the national planning policy should apply? It clearly states:

> "Planning obligations should never be used as a means of securing for the local community a share of the profits of the development".

If it should apply, does that not mean that regeneration benefits will be much smaller than the Government say?

Mr. Whittingdale: I do think that it should apply, and I have been disturbed by one or two reports suggesting that it may have been contravened.

The one concession that the Secretary of State made this afternoon, which is welcome, was her agreement to introduce a separate use class for all casinos. A number of us were concerned that one of the drivers towards proliferation would be the ability of leisure facilities within the same use class to convert to casinos. So she appears at least to have closed off one option this afternoon, and we welcome that.

Another concern about which the scrutiny Committee heard evidence was that one of the major contributors to increased problem gambling is convenience. Professor Peter Collins said:

> "from a problem gambling point of view, there is no doubt that it is better not to locate casinos in town centres. There is no question of that".

It is for that reason that we in the scrutiny Committee regard it as essential that regional casinos should not be on high streets, but located away from where people live. We had understood that that was originally the Secretary of State's own view, but in deciding the most suitable areas for regional casinos, regional planning bodies have been told explicitly that they must take account of planning guidance that requires major new facilities to promote the vitality and viability of existing town centres.

The letter that the Minister sent to the scrutiny Committee confirmed that PPS6 and PPG13 together

> "direct casinos towards the most central and accessible locations".

He even went as far as to suggest that any applications that did not follow that guidance were likely to be called in. The scrutiny Committee concluded that there was an inconsistency between the policy objectives of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and those of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I have to say that "inconsistency" seems to me to be a considerable understatement. If the Secretary of State is to deliver the Bill's objective of protecting children and the vulnerable, it is essential that the planning guidance for the location of new casinos should be changed.

Another difference between the draft Bill and the one before us today relates to new category A, so-called "million pound" jackpot machines. Originally, the Government proposed that they should be allowed in all casinos and be subject only to the machine-to-table ratio. They also proposed that in regional casinos there should be no limit on numbers at all. Although it was not a recommendation of the scrutiny Committee, the Government then decided to restrict category A machines to regional casinos alone and impose a cap on the number of machines at 1,250. By doing that, they will increase the attraction of regional casinos and severely disadvantage existing UK operators. Those companies rightly point out that they will be unable to compete if they are prevented from offering any category A machines in their existing casinos while the new regional ones can contain up to 1,250 such machines. The pressure on them to convert into regional casinos will be enormous and will lead to still more proliferation.

The answer, as the scrutiny Committee again pointed out, is to allow a limited number of category A machines into small and large casinos, or alternatively to increase the maximum stake and prize that category B machines can offer. That would help to address the problem of the cliff edge that the Government have created between large and regional casinos.

As I said earlier, however, we also believe that there is a case for further limiting the number of category A machines. Most operators predict that the maximum number of 1,250 machines in regional casinos will, as the Secretary of State confirmed, contain a mix of different categories. We believe that, within the overall limit, it makes sense to impose a further restriction on category A machines so that we can monitor the effect of their introduction in this country.

There is one more measure of protection that we believe is necessary. At present, the membership requirement for UK casinos allows operators to bar from their premises those who are known to be problem gamblers. It is another important safeguard to try to stop gambling addiction. Yet by scrapping the membership requirements, that protection will be lost. The lack of any form of identification requirement also removes a vital safeguard against money laundering. Indeed, it may well be in breach of the EU's third directive on money laundering. According to the press yesterday, a senior civil servant wrote to American casino companies asking what dispensations they wanted under the legislation. The companies then made it clear—

Tessa Jowell: The hon. Gentleman may want to withdraw that comment and I undertake to write to him separately about it. The allegation is untrue.

Mr. Whittingdale: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for her assurance that those reports were untrue. I, of course, accept her word on that, but it does not change the fact that the Government are proposing to exempt large casinos from the requirement to identify those who are involved in transactions of more than £700. I would be interested to know whether the Secretary of State also denies the report that the Association of Chief Police Officers has protested about that. Is that also wrong?

Tessa Jowell: I am very happy to say that, given that one of the objectives of the Bill is to keep gambling crime-free, we have of course consulted the police throughout. Discussions on the money laundering directive are a matter for the Treasury and still continue. In its final shape, the Bill will ensure that we keep crime out—money laundering or any other crime that could infiltrate gambling in this country.

Mr. Whittingdale: The most effective way of preventing money laundering is to retain the requirement that those undertaking large transactions must provide identification. Under the Bill, that safeguard will be lost. The safeguard against money laundering and the membership requirement, which would provide an additional layer of protection for those who are suffering from gambling addiction, are to be removed simply because they do not happen to satisfy the American business model.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman is talking about measures to protect vulnerable people from being seduced by gambling. There has been a furore in the popular press about the Bill having the effect of increasing and enhancing gambling among vulnerable people, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that if that same popular press were really concerned about protecting people from being seduced by gambling, they could play their part by removing the racing sections from their papers, which not only encourage people to gamble, but advise them on how to do so?

Mr. Whittingdale: We are concerned about the Bill partly because it represents a completely new and different form of gambling from anything that we have seen before. It is for that reason that we are urging caution. I am interested that the Secretary of State said that my comments on the membership requirement were incorrect. In that case, perhaps she will reconsider whether it would be wise to retain a membership requirement both to tackle problem gambling and to deal with the danger of money laundering.

Mr. Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Whittingdale: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I must wind up my remarks.

The Bill initially enjoyed widespread support, but by refusing to listen to those who have advocated a cautious approach combined with sensible safeguards, the Government have managed to unite almost everyone against it. People are against the Bill, not because of snobbery but because it will disadvantage responsible and long-standing UK companies, lead to a proliferation of casinos in our towns and cities and risk creating a massive increase in problem gambling. The Secretary of State has said that she is listening and is prepared to amend the Bill. It is a pity that she was not willing to do so earlier.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the next speaker, I remind the House that Mr. Speaker has placed a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches, which will apply from now on.

5.13 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has had a difficult task introducing the Bill today. As we have been good friends for more than 33 years, I hope that we will remain so at the end of this debate and of future ones. I feel fairly confident that she was not referring to me in her reference to a whiff of snobbery, and I hope that she will excuse me from any charge of opportunism.

I support most of the Bill because we clearly need to modernise the laws on gambling, but I oppose the proposal to make it easier for multinational casinos to rip off hard-working British families. There is no public demand for the provisions in the Bill. Before there was any unstimulated demand, shall we say, opinion polls showed that more than 90 per cent. of the population believed that there were enough opportunities for gambling already. People have come to my advice surgeries about housing, schools, pensions, passports and policing, but in 25 years I cannot recall one person coming to see me because they wanted us to increase the opportunities for gambling. I have, however, had quite a lot of people coming to see me because their lives have been ruined by their spouse's gambling away all the family income. We should not do anything that is likely to increase the opportunities for that. There is no public demand for the changes, so we appear to be changing the law to make it easier for casino companies to tempt hard-working British families to lose their money so that they can make profits. It is worth remembering that the casinos cannot make profits unless most punters lose their money.

In future, we shall permit extra temptations that are not currently on offer. It will be possible to walk into a casino with no cooling-off period of 24 hours. There will be an enormous number of machines and prizes of possibly £1 million in those places. We are lifting the restriction on advertising so that casinos can deliberately stimulate demand that does not exist without such stimulation. That will increase gambling, especially through slot machines, and the evidence shows that slot machines are a major source of problem gambling and of people getting hooked.

I am not only worried about those who may get hooked on gambling. I believe that, at a time when we are discussing the need for more people to save, be careful with money and put money aside for their pensions and for the future, it is foolish of the Government to say, "We're going to make it easier for you to blow it at a casino."

The Government claim that there will not be a large increase in the number of casinos but just 20 or 40 new ones. Ministers have referred to those figures as "a modest increase" on the existing 134. An increase of 40 on 134 is 30 per cent. If the trade unions presented a proposal for a 30 per cent. increase in the national minimum wage, I do not believe that the Cabinet would regard it as a modest increase that should be approved.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dobson: I would rather get on because others want to speak.

The problem is not only 40 more casinos but that they will be much larger. If they are allowed 1,250 slot machines each, it means, as I understand it, that each new one will have more slot machines than those in all the existing casinos put together. That increases the opportunity for gambling. The bigger prizes on offer make it more likely that people will gamble and that there will be more gambling.

We are told that the Bill will permit the regeneration of inner cities. Have we reached the stage when the only way in which we can regenerate our inner cities depends on inviting American casino companies to bail us out? That is not the best way to achieve regeneration. If we stick it on top of 24-hour drinking, the combination will not greatly assist the prevailing situation in many of our inner cities.

We are told that there will be not only a casino built at each location but hotels, restaurants and entertainment facilities, as if they would tempt people away from the tables and machines. They will not. The hotels, restaurants and entertainment will be there to attract people to the casinos so that they go to the restaurant and afterwards to the tables; stay at the hotel and go to the tables, and go to a show and subsequently to the tables. Things that are presented as a means of amelioration are there to make the casinos more attractive.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dobson: I should prefer not to because others want to speak.

I have every sympathy with the people of Blackpool and of other holiday resorts. It would be a good idea if the Government acknowledged that Blackpool and one or two other places might benefit from one of the new casinos. They could choose the places—I have never objected to central Government's making a few decisions now and again. If that happened, we could ascertain how the casinos worked. A private Bill that covered several places could subsequently be promoted or a measure could be introduced from the centre. That might show us what could be done and bring benefits to those areas.

However, if there are to be big casinos in every major centre of population, the holiday resort casinos can forget the massive improvement in takings that they expect because people will not go to Blackpool if they can go to a casino nearer home in Manchester. All the points that I have made so far concern the public. Let me say something about the harm that I believe the proposals are doing to the reputation of the Labour party and the Labour Government. They are putting off a lot of people whom we would do well not to put off—a lot of concerned people who are already unhappy about one or two aspects of the Government's policies.

People come up to me and ask "Why is he doing it?" I think they are referring to the Prime Minister. They consider the Bill to be contrary to the Labour party's normal slightly paternalistic, slightly puritan image. It is also rather at variance with the greater emphasis on religious belief that has been common in Government in recent times. And it is contrary to things that the Chancellor and others are saying about the need to save and put money aside for pensions.

There is no public demand for the Bill. The demand is coming from American gambling companies. They may have changed; but in the eyes of the British public—who may remember films made years ago—they are connected with organised crime, money laundering, drugs and prostitution. That is the sort of word association that occurs to people, and I think it is very damaging to our party. It does make people wonder "Why are they doing it?" I think that that question itself is very damaging to us as a party.

I believe that the Bill would be bad for the country, bad for hard-working families and bad for the party. It is the worst possible political combination: it is both wrong and unpopular.

5.21 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I join the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) in thanking the Secretary of State, and indeed expressing admiration of her for coming here today in the light of her recent bereavement.

[Mr. Don Foster]

The hon. Gentleman was right to praise the work of the Joint Committee, and in particular its Chairman, the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway). The Secretary of State has accused the Bill's opponents of grabbing opportunism from a passing bandwagon. She fails to understand that many people who initially supported much more of the Bill were influenced by the Government's failure to note some of the Committee's recommendations.

The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford summarised his party's concerns. We share many of them, as our amendment makes clear. It explains why we will vote against Second Reading, notwithstanding one welcome U-turn by the Secretary of State about which I shall say more later.

As others have observed, much of the Bill is welcome. It provides a much-needed updating of existing legislation. Like many other people, we are pleased about the stronger, broader regulation that will result from the replacement of the Gaming Board with the gambling commission. It will be stronger because the commission will have greater powers to rescind licences, impose higher fines and enter and inspect premises. It will be broader because it will cover remote gambling such as internet, betting-exchange and interactive television gambling.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman was good enough to acknowledge one concession made by the Secretary of State, among a number of others. But how can he say that he supports at least 90 per cent. of the Bill, and then vote against its Second Reading? He could try to make further improvements during a Committee stage that he will deny the Bill if it is not passed tonight.

Mr. Foster: First, the Secretary of State's concessions are not actually in the Bill. Secondly, we are concerned about many other matters, which I shall enumerate shortly. Thirdly, as I shall explain, in many instances we feel that the Government's basic premises are seriously flawed. For those three reasons, we will vote against the Bill.

I was referring to the need to have control over remote gambling. The Secretary of State rightly points to the 3 million to 4 million people involved in internet gambling. We note that those involved in providing it—for example, Sportingbet—are reporting significant increases in turnover. Yet at the same time it is deeply worrying to learn that it is very easy for children and young people to become involved in that. A recent survey showed that an 11-year-old girl was able to register with 30 out of 37 internet gambling sites, so we accept entirely that regulation is needed to protect the vulnerable and to ensure integrity.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): If the hon. Gentleman sincerely believes that the Bill cures the problems to which he has just referred, how can he support opposing the Bill at this stage? I could understand his party voting against it on Third Reading if the improvements that he desired had not been made, but how can he possible justify it at this time?

Mr. Foster: I think that I have already answered that question in reply to the hon. Member for West Ham (Mr. Banks), but while 90 per cent. of the Bill may well be good, and I believe that it is, if the 10 per cent. is so very bad and continues to be so, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not accept that we should support it, and I want to deal now with my serious concerns about it.

May I refer in passing to the broader remit of the gambling commission? I welcome the fact that it will require casinos and others to have higher standards in respect of social responsibility and that those involved have agreed to a target of a £3 million contribution to a fund to alleviate some of the problems caused by gambling, but I remind the House that that figure is only 0.035 per cent. of the £8.5 billion that is spent annually in this country on gambling, and I suspect that it is unlikely to prove to be a high enough figure, so I welcome the fact that the Secretary of State will have reserve powers to impose a levy if that is the case.

To return to the point that has just been made, I am concerned about some aspects of the Bill, particularly those proposals relating to the new super-casinos and the enormous number of unlimited-prize machines that there might be within them. We are worried about the likely number of such casinos, their location, the speed of their introduction and the controls over them. We are particularly worried about the introduction of the unlimited-prize machines in such large numbers without any significant research having been done into the likely effects that they will have on problem gambling. The Secretary of State has told us that only 10 per cent. of machines in super-casinos may be of this type, but even if that is the case—I suspect that it will be far more—we will still be introducing 5,000 of these machines in this country without any sort of trial. I am also worried that the Secretary of State in response to the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford said that it will be for the gambling commission to decide what that percentage will be. For the sake of anyone thinking of investing in these new super-casinos, I hope that the gambling commission will be up and running and have made a decision on what that proportion will be, because presumably that will directly impact upon a potential investor's decision whether to set up such a casino.

Jim Knight: The hon. Gentleman could have made many of these criticisms when the White Paper was published in March, yet in a Liberal Democrat press release his colleague, the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey), said:

> "At last Britain is moving with the times, giving British resorts the opportunity to challenge America as a destination for casino holidays."

Does he now disagree with his hon. Friend?

Mr. Foster: No, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey), but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will read the end of that press release, which points to the issue of problem gambling. He read it out accurately and I am grateful to him for doing that because my hon. Friend specifically referred to destination casinos. One of the key problems is that the Secretary of State and her Government have changed the clear recommendation on destination casinos that my hon. Friend was supporting at the time.

Mr. Kevan Jones: The hon. Gentleman said that he realised that online betting and access by children to that is a real problem, with which I agree. Why therefore will he and other Liberal Democrats vote against the regulation of that tonight? Thanks very much for giving us another soundbite for a leaflet.

Mr. Foster: Thank you very much to the hon. Gentleman for giving Liberal Democrats the soundbite that he is happy to go ahead with unrestricted regional casinos that 93 per cent. of the British public do not want. Of course, if he intends to vote against the Bill, he has the same problem that he alleges I have.

Mr. Jones: The hon. Gentleman must wait until I make my contribution. I shall certainly argue for some limitations on the Bill. Is that not what he should be doing, rather than throwing everything out, including some very welcome provisions to protect the most vulnerable in our society, namely children, which clearly the Liberal Democrats do not want to do tonight?

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman wants to have his cake and eat it—but he is entitled to do that.

We have some concerns and some suggestions about how the Bill could be improved. As the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said, recent opinion polls show that people do not want increased gambling opportunities, not least because of the inevitable increase in problem gambling that they will create. Many people do not want regeneration in their area if it comes on the back of creating significant misery for many people locally.

We already have more than 300,000 gamblers—probably far more—and the Bill as it stands will inevitably increase that significantly. Everyone seems to believe that—every independent commentator—except the Secretary of State. The whole House will surely have been surprised when she said to the Joint Committee:

> "If this legislation gave rise to an increase in problem gambling then it would have failed and it would be bad legislation."

We have had rash statements before. We all remember the Deputy Prime Minister's promise to reduce the number of car journeys within five years: a tall order, but hold me to it, he said. Many of us will recall John Patten—now Lord Patten—making the wonderful promise that he would eat his hat garnished if he did not meet his targets in relation to grant-maintained schools. The real question is what the Secretary of State will do if the Bill fails under the criteria that she set. I am sure that we all desperately hope that it will not involve her parading as a croupier. She at least tempered what she had said when she told my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) that nobody could say that there would not be at least one more problem gambler. I suspect that there will be far more.

Bob Russell: Will my hon. Friend ask the House to reflect on the fact that 300,000, which is the number of problem gamblers already known about, is three times the number of soldiers in Her Majesty's armed forces? That puts in context the sheer volume of problem gamblers already out there.

Mr. Foster: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to one way of showing just how large a number a third of a million people is. He will be well aware that the clear evidence is that with the introduction of what could be 5,000 highly addictive category A machines the number is likely to increase significantly. It is not only the public and politicians of all parties who are concerned about this but the British businesses that will be affected. The Government said in the White Paper that > "the legitimate interests of all parties should be taken fully into account".

It is strange, then—perhaps the Minister can explain it to the House—that the Government plan to remove category D machines from fish and chip shops and taxi offices but there has been no consultation whatever with representatives of those businesses, although estimates show that up to 600 of them are likely to close as a result. In passing, he might explain what the difference is between ambient gambling in a fish and chip shop or taxi office and in a motorway service station. Many people are confused about that aspect of the legislation.

Businesses are also concerned about what appears to be preferential treatment for American casino operators. The British casino industry is understandably worried that the odds are being significantly stacked in favour of the Americans. It is the British businesses, not the American ones, who have, over 40 years, built an enviable record of integrity, fairness and social responsibility. They have raised issues of integrity about membership. We are not talking about a return to the 24-hour rule, but about having at least a membership requirement so that a record is kept of all those who enter premises. Surely the Minister and the Secretary of State have been consulting the police, and I would be amazed if the Minister tells us that the police and others have all said a membership registration scheme would not assist on money laundering or on the issues of problem gambling.

The final version of the Bill came as a huge shock to many people, including the casino industry, and there are more shocks still to come. The Bill contains many references to numerous, as yet unavailable, codes and regulations and to 32 additional powers for the Secretary of State. Many people have real concerns, some of them very basic.

The Government's arguments for more casinos do not seem to add up. They cannot even tell us how many casinos there are. Last week, on the Floor of the House, the Prime Minister told us there are 120. The DCMS website says there are 122. In response to the Joint Committee, Lord McIntosh said there were 126. More recently, in a press release, he said there were 130. The House of Commons Library, whose figures I prefer to believe, says that the figure is none of those, but is 131. If the Government cannot even get the basic facts right, how can we have confidence in other things they say?

We have been told that the Bill would be revenue-neutral, but that statement has been withdrawn, which is not surprising because the regulatory impact assessment says that the Bill should > "increase casino turnover and therefore (all being equal) tax/duty revenue".

[Mr. Foster]

There is confusion, too, about the number of jobs that will be created. The Prime Minister, again on the Floor of the House last week, and in a press briefing, said there would be 80,000. The Secretary of State says in articles in today's papers that there will be 85,000. Leaving that aside, in the run-up to the Bill jobs have actually been lost. British gaming machine manufacturing jobs have been lost to America, and further job losses are predicted. The Henley Centre claims that there will be "no significant employment gains" as a result of the Bill. It argues that > "certain sectors of the leisure industry, for example pubs, restaurants and hotels, will be put under great pressure in their competing leisure offerings with casinos."

In other words, it is likely that super-casinos will merely displace jobs, not create new ones.

If the super-casinos are going to take away some existing gambling business, a threat is also posed to such things as the national lottery. What will be the impact on good causes? As I said at Question Time, what will be the impact on our Olympic funding package? The regulatory impact assessment is quite clear that there will be implications. Even if national lottery sales decline by just 2.5 per cent., that would lead to a loss of almost £50 million a year for the good causes, of which £27 million would be from the Olympic lottery fund. Over five years, that figure would be more than £100 million. The Minister must explain how the funding gap will be closed in our plans for the Olympic bid.

The case for regeneration, however seductive it may be, frankly has not been made.

Mrs. Humble: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of a report commissioned by the Northwest Development Agency and the Lancashire West partnership for the eight councils in west Lancashire on the regeneration potential of regional casinos? It has identified a substantial increase in net jobs and investment into the local area, and I recommend that the hon. Gentleman reads it before he makes further comments about regeneration.

Mr. Foster: I am grateful. The honest and truthful answer is that I was not aware of the report, but if the hon. Lady will make it available, I shall be delighted to read it. My point, though, is a simple one: there are conflicting bits of evidence about the issue, and it is wrong of the Government to claim categorically that all the additional jobs will be created when there is conflicting evidence about that. Surely, as many hon. Members have suggested, a far better way forward, adopting the precautionary principle, would be to move slowly, possibly by having just one new super-casino in each region. Then, we will have an opportunity to judge whether the hon. Lady's evidence or the Henley Centre's evidence or the Prime Minister's evidence is correct.

The other worry that the House should have about the Bill relates to the opinions of Lord McIntosh, who for a while has fronted up the Government's views on the Bill. He told the Joint Committee:

> "I see gambling reform, which would be introduced by the Gambling Bill, as having three aspects: one is regulation, and that is clearly what the Bill is about, and that is most of what you have been covering; the second is the tax regime; and the third is the location regime. You will not fully understand the gambling reform unless you have all those three legs of the stool in place."

I am sure that he is absolutely right, but there is nothing in the Bill about the tax regime, which Lord McIntosh said was crucial if we were to understand the reform. The Secretary of State told us from the Dispatch Box only an hour ago that the tax regime for gambling was nothing to do with her and that it was all to do with the Treasury. However, if we do not have a clear understanding of the tax regime, how can we know how many new super-casinos there will be? Lord McIntosh agrees with me, but there is nothing in the Bill.

Lord McIntosh said that the location regime was the second of the three legs, but what there is on that is wholly inadequate, confusing and flawed. So basically, we have a Bill that is two legs short of a stool. We simply cannot understand the reform, as Lord McIntosh said, unless we have the other details.

We are also expected to be confident that the industry will ensure that there will be only between 20 and 40 of the new casinos. That is what the Prime Minister and the Government have claimed. The Government say that that range is an industry prediction, but I would be interested to know which part of the industry made that prediction. When I ask people in the industry whether they made it they say, "No, it's what the Government have told us, and because we find it so difficult to decide how many it should be, we haven't disagreed with them." I hope that the Minister can say which parts of the industry have told the Government that the range will be between 20 and 40. If he cannot say now, perhaps he will put the answer in the Library, because people in the industry are not capable of making such a prediction.

When people in the industry try to work out the figure and find how difficult it is they take into account the fact that there have been about 100 planning applications already, and the fact that it is reported that MGM has recently said that 10 per cent. of its global profits would come from the UK alone. Will the figure be only between 20 and 40? Who knows? But let us not be so complacent as to believe that it will be.

That is why it was so bizarre when the Secretary of State said only a few days ago in her press notice introducing the legislation:

> "This is a Bill about new protections, not new casinos."

What nonsense. This is a Bill about new casinos—that is the bit of the Bill that everyone is so concerned about. The Secretary of State is deeply wrong. We are concerned about the new casinos, how many there will be, where they will be and whether the profits from them will disappear from this country and end up in America. The Bill fails in the location regime in so many ways.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): Is it not the case that the Bill originally was about one resort casino, possibly in Blackpool, and that it had broad support? Now that the Bill has grown like Topsy there is less support. Surely if the Government want the Bill to go through, they ought to return to the original concept.

Mr. Foster: My hon. Friend is brilliant at moving me on to the next part of my speech, which is about destination casinos. The Joint Committee argued for the very point that my hon. Friend made. We should not be talking about regional casinos, but about leisure destination casinos. The Committee recognised the danger of super-casinos on the high street because of the clear link between casual, "walk in and play" gambling and problem gambling. The Government initially appeared to agree, which is why so many of us are so shocked at what has happened in the final stages of drafting the Bill.

In giving evidence to the Joint Committee at the end of last year, Lord McIntosh appeared to agree with the merits of making "a positive decision" to go gambling, rather than > "casual gambling which is thrust at you at the street corner".

Well, he seems to have changed his mind, although in the press release that he issued two days ago, he suddenly talked about destination casinos again, so whether that was a U-turn or merely a blunder, we do not know.

Fundamentally, the Government have missed the point about the type of super-casinos in limited numbers in which people might be interested. We simply do not know whether the benefits to which the Government refer—not only jobs, but economic regeneration—will come. In an earlier intervention, I quoted circular 1/97, which states:

> "Planning obligations should never be used as a means of securing for the local community a share in the profits of the development."

In other words, councils cannot expect exceptional planning gain to occur. The Minister will say that circular 1/97 is out of date and has been superseded by the new Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004, but when he looks at that measure, he will see that the principle has not been changed. Can he confirm whether I am correct that councils will not be able to get exceptional planning gain when such applications are made?

David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): On several occasions, it has been suggested that local authorities are the safeguard on the Bill. Are not the turnovers of some of the companies involved triple or quadruple the amount that most local authorities have? Local authorities will not be in a position to challenge what is proposed. How can one local authority reject a proposal when another will be waiting at the sidelines to accept it?

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman is right to be concerned about that issue—the potential for bribing, as it has sometimes been unfairly described. It is vital that the Government consider the point that I have made in relation to the so-called section 106 agreements and what will and will not be permissible under that legislation. He raised the issue of the power of local authorities. Of course, the Government have suggested that authorities will be all-powerful in this matter. They have certainly been helped by today's announcement of the U-turn on the creation of a separate use class for all casinos. I welcome that very much, but I point out that the Bill as drafted still creates problems for individual local authorities in respect of whether they can reject specific casino proposals.

I accept entirely that it is possible under clause 157 for local authorities to reject all casinos over a period of three years. In passing, I say to the Minister that I think that he will find that there is a difficulty with the clause, which specifically states:

> "A licensing authority may resolve not to issue casino premises licences."

It goes on to state:

> "In passing a resolution under subsection (1) a licensing authority may have regard to any principle or matter."

The Secretary of State has written on the front of the Bill that she believes that the provisions are compatible with the Human Rights Act 1998, but I suspect that, with the inclusion of that provision, which allows a local council to consider any matter, she will find herself in difficulty. When one lawyer looked at the provision, he said to me, "I see prosperity staring me in the face." I suspect that he is likely to be right.

I accept that a council can reject a proposal for a three-year period, but the problem is that if they want to consider the merits of having a small casino in their area that they think might bring benefits, they will be in much greater difficulty. They will not have the ability easily to say yes or no. As hon. Members have said, the demand test has been rejected. Local authorities will not have powers to talk about public nuisance, as they do in respect of licensing, or to address saturation. Many local authority powers will be undermined, and councils do not have the specific powers to say yes or no to a specific casino proposal, notwithstanding clause 157. As I said, however, I am delighted at the change in use categories that the Secretary of State announced today.

I began my speech by welcoming the goods parts of the Bill: regulating remote gambling, enshrining social responsibility, protecting children and establishing a new and more powerful regulator. Despite those provisions, we still need measures that will control the proliferation of super-casinos, perhaps by allowing one or two per region to start with, and we need to consider delaying the introduction of category A machines until further research has been undertaking; to reintroduce the concept of super-casinos as destination casinos to increase control of them, perhaps by introducing a membership requirement again; and to provide strong and absolute powers to local councils to specifically reject individual casino applications. Only if the Bill contained such measures could we continue supporting it. They are not in the Bill at present, which is why we will vote against it.

5.50 pm

Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen) (Lab): The Bill contains three licensing objectives that underpin the functions that the gambling commission and licensing authorities will perform: to protect children and other vulnerable persons from being harmed or exploited by gambling; to prevent gambling being a source of crime or disorder, being associated with crime or disorder or being used to support crime; and to ensure that gambling is conducted fairly and openly. I am astonished by the attitude of the Opposition parties. Whatever they say about parts of the Bill that they support, they cannot have it both ways. If they vote against Second Reading tonight, we can conclude only that they do not support those aims of the Bill.

[Janet Anderson]

The third objective—that gambling should be conducted fairly and openly—is surely important. It is a recent development that, to some extent, gambling is hidden away—remote gambling—but it is a growth industry and is an increasingly popular pursuit for women. The Bill recognises and accommodates the significant technological changes that have occurred in the past 40 years. It requires regulation where the player is not present on the operator's premises. For example, operators based in Great Britain must obtain an operating licence to authorise the provision of gambling via remote communication—for example, via television or the internet. Moreover, the new licensing system has quite sensibly been designed to keep pace with technological developments so that, subject to appropriate parliamentary approval, gambling delivered by new, unforeseen methods can be regulated in the future.

That area of gambling is currently unregulated, so for that reason alone doing nothing is not an option. We must ensure that children and young people are properly protected, and the Bill will, for the first time, impose restrictions on such gambling.

My principal interest in the Bill is as a former Minister for Tourism and the current secretary of the all-party parliamentary group on tourism. Our tourism industry is worth a staggering £80 billion to the UK economy, yet our tourism deficit stands at around £14 billion. For every pound spent in the UK by a tourist from overseas, Britons spend £2 abroad. The number of visits abroad by UK residents is approaching three times the number of overseas visits to the UK. There is a desperate need to reverse the trend by offering better value for money and a more innovative product.

That is particularly true of our seaside resorts. As the British Resorts Association pointed out in its excellent report, "Behind the Façade", serious pockets of deprivation are hidden behind the façade of the sea front, because of the seasonal nature of employment and the declining quality of the tourism product on offer. Let us take Blackpool as an example. I make no apology for citing Blackpool. It is situated in my region, the north-west, and many of my constituents know it well. Over the past 15 years it has seen little private investment and no major interventions to ignite regeneration and transform the resort product.

Annual visits have decreased from 13.2 million to 10.6 million, visitor nights from 16 million to 10.5 million, and spending by overnight visitors from £800 million to £500 million. The resort's income profile has become more seasonal, with the summer season becoming shorter and the peak less pronounced. The average annual hotel occupancy rate has fallen to 22 per cent., and more than 20,000 bedrooms have transferred lawfully or unlawfully to the private rented residential sector. I will not dwell too long on the facts about the town as my hon. Friends who represent Blackpool are much more knowledgeable about local circumstances than I am.

I single out Blackpool because the town has risen to the challenge of reinventing its tourism product. The Blackpool master plan proposes a multiple gambling, leisure and entertainment product packaged in a unique "Blackpool experience". This destination gambling environment would import revenue into the local economy, rather than recirculate existing revenue. It would transform a seasonal economy into a year-round economy. It would become the catalyst for economic regeneration that would transform decline into growth and prosperity—

Miss Kirkbride: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Janet Anderson: No, I will not give way because, as the hon. Lady knows, we are short of time.

The economic regeneration would import pounds and euros into the north-west regional economy. The proposals anticipated the Government's decision to modernise outdated gambling legislation and create opportunities to introduce large casino-based leisure experiences to the UK market. The proposals have received wide support from the local community and from all political parties in the town. Opposition Members who have announced their intention to oppose the Bill would do well to remember that. Their colleagues in Blackpool will not thank them for their attempts to derail the legislation.

Let us not get too carried away about the extent to which the plans would be based on casinos. Yes, the proposals for resort, destination or regional casinos, however we choose to describe them, are at the heart of the plan, but casinos represent a mere 8 per cent. of the development. They would, however, provide direct employment for 7,500 people and ignite a resort-wide regeneration programme that would include residential, retail, professional services, leisure and entertainment development, airport expansion and transport infrastructure development, and support about 27,300 jobs.

Blackpool's plans are well advanced. That is one reason why I believe such resorts should be given special consideration, but there is another and perhaps more important reason. Much concern has been expressed that the Bill will result in a proliferation of gambling dens. We must ensure that that does not happen. I therefore welcome the Government's acceptance of the scrutiny Committee's recommendation that the new regional casinos should be limited to 1,250 machines. I also welcome the comments of the Secretary of State and the Minister that the Government are willing to listen.

The Casino Operators Association of the UK has called for a limit to the number of regional casinos, believing that that will help to combat an increase in problem gambling. Blackpool borough council suggests limiting regional casino development to five locations during the first nine years. It also recommends that tourism-based casino developments should be favoured where there is potential to grow net revenue rather than displace and recirculate existing local spending.

The Joint Committee was encouraged by the comments of the Minister, the noble Lord McIntosh, who stated that his Department's policy aim was to reduce the number of premises that can have category A machines to > "limit the accessibility of jackpot machines in order to reduce the potential for problem gambling".

As the Committee stated in its final report:

> "We believe the Government is right to proceed with caution", but it also concluded that the legislation is "necessary and urgent."

I welcome what the Secretary of State said today about a separate use class order. I am sure that that will be widely welcomed. The Bill is broadly a good Bill. I will support it in the Lobby tonight. I urge Opposition Members to think again about their decision to vote against it because, as I said, they need to think carefully about how that will be interpreted outside.

In conclusion, I hope that the Government will agree to think again by limiting the number of larger regional casinos, initially, perhaps to one or two per region, with particular regard to the tourism and regeneration potential. By doing so, they will help to allay a number of the concerns of hon. Members in all parts of the House and reassure the public.

5.59 pm

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): In the 25-plus years in which I have been privileged to be a Member of the House, I have been called many things, particularly during the years that I was privileged to stand at the ministerial Dispatch Box, but until the Secretary of State came along, no one had ever called me a snob. In so doing, she told us more about herself and her attitudes than she informed the House about me.

In the time that is available, I want to put on record the views of some fellow snobs—the Evangelical Alliance, with more than 4,000 church members, the Christian Institute, with hundreds of members, the Methodist Church and the Salvation Army.

I had the privilege of listening to Sir David Frost interview the Secretary of State yesterday, and listening to John Humphrys interview her this morning. She made a point about the need for more regulation—she made it today—with which I agree. However, four questions were repeatedly put to the right hon. Lady that she could not or would not answer. She went on about the Bill being 90 per cent. about protection and only 10 per cent. about casinos. She was asked, perfectly reasonably, "Why don't you split the Bill into two? Do the 90 per cent. regulation, on which there is broad agreement across the Floor of the House and in the country, and then have a separate provision under which the other matters can be dealt with in some detail?" Never once did the right hon. Lady answer that question.

It is not just my question. The Evangelical Alliance says:

> "No one disputes that problem gamblers exist. But the Government has no answer to the logic that an increase in the availability of gambling will inevitably increase problem gambling".

Why not separate the two areas of the Bill? Why not put a Bill through Parliament with which all of us can agree, and then deal with the second issue in the longer term?

The second question that the Secretary of State could not or would not answer was the benefit to the Treasury, which has varied from nothing—the right hon. Lady tells us that that was a mistake—to £3 billion. When asked about it she said, "Well, of course, that has got nothing to do with me. That is for the Chancellor of the Exchequer." It is as though she or the Chancellor were semi-detached from the Government. They are both part of the Government; they have collective responsibility. We know that, for internal Labour party reasons, the Government would like the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be seen as semi-detached, but that is not a good enough answer when we come to a fundamental question. If we do not know the tax regime and if we do not know what has been promised to Las Vegas, mega-style casino operators, the Government cannot be surprised if there is general scepticism throughout the country.

The Evangelical Alliance says that

> "the initial tone of the draft proposals promised deregulation not regulation. Otherwise why would gambling interests spend an alleged £100 million on lobbying unless they believed they would stand to gain from the proposals?"

The third question put to the Secretary of State by Sir David Frost, by John Humphrys, by my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) from the Opposition Front Bench and by others, to which the right hon. Lady had no compelling answer, was, "Given this level of concern, why not put a control on the numbers and introduce more stringent planning controls?" The right hon. Lady made a small concession today—it was a small one given the range of planning issues raised by the Bill, but it was welcome. I pay tribute to her for doing so. I wish that I could believe that she had done so because she was persuaded by the logic of the argument rather than because she was trying to entice a few of the Labour Members sitting behind her to go into the Lobby with her this evening.

There is a fundamental disparity. The Secretary of State says, "Don't worry, it will be all right. There will only be 20 to 40 casinos." There is not one regulatory power in the Bill that enables the right hon. Lady to say with confidence that there will be only 20 to 40. There are widespread media reports that so far there are 175 different proposals. When push comes to shove—given some of the people who will be involved in this business, the House should be sure that push will come to shove—20 to 40 casinos seems like so much else that the Government have predicted over the past seven years, and that is pie in the sky. It will not happen. I know that I will not be in this place to be made to eat my words if I am wrong, but I confidently tell the House that over a period 40 casinos will seem but a distant memory of some Secretary of State who was trying, to the best of her ability, to get legislation through the House about which there was considerable concern.

The Christian Institute says:

> "The scrapping of the 'demand test' (which currently limits the number of casinos and betting shops) will make it very hard for local councils to reject planning applications. The formal legislation of Fixed Odd Betting Terminals in casinos and betting shops is equally worrying."

That is the third question that the Secretary of State cannot answer and that the Bill does not accommodate.

The fourth question put to the right hon. Lady by Sir David Frost and by John Humphrys—it was put to her in the House today—has still not received an answer. It is that the Bill will increase addiction and gambling problems for real people. I think that this view is shared across the Floor of the House. I take no delight from the fact that there are 300,000 problem gamblers in this country.

Jim Knight: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Brian Mawhinney: No.

None of us takes pride from that figure. It is as certain as day follows night that it will rocket as a consequence of the Bill.

> "There is no public demand for an increase in gambling opportunities", say the Salvation Army and the Methodist Church.

> "The national opinion poll commissioned by the Salvation Army showed that 93 per cent. of the population think that there are already enough opportunities to gamble in the UK. Regulations should be brought up to date but there is no appetite for an explosion of hard forms of gambling."

That was the point made by the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), and I join him in affirming that Methodist Church and Salvation Army point.

The Methodist Church and the Salvation Army also said that they > "do not believe that a rise in problem gambling is a price worth paying."

The difficulty about a debate around technology as complex as that included in the Bill is that it is all too easy to lose sight of the real people in real families in real households and in real communities who will be damaged—many of them beyond repair—as a consequence of the Bill.

It used to be said of the Labour party that it was the Methodist Church at prayer. That is no longer the case if the Bill reflects current Labour party thinking. However, in one respect the Bill does go with the flow of new Labour, for its outcome will be gambling problems for the many, not just for the few.

6.8 pm

Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton) (Lab): The Government's aim of protecting those who are vulnerable, as well as children, by introducing the Bill is welcome. The development of new forms of gambling, such as those on the internet and on mobile phones, shows that there is a clear need to update our gambling laws. The new gambling commission will have significant powers to investigate and prosecute where necessary. It will be able to monitor the areas of problem gambling.

There is much that is good in the Bill but I have concerns, which I hope will be addressed during the passage of the Bill. Many jobs in my constituency rely on the gambling industry in one way or another: Uttoxeter is one of the best local race courses in the country and is home to the Midlands grand national, while in Burton upon Trent, the brewing industry has led to the development of not only Marmite, but pub companies and gaming machine companies such as Leisure Link. I am concerned that long-established, home-grown UK businesses should not inadvertently lose out under the Bill.

The likely effect of an unlimited number of regional casinos would be the demise of small casinos. The competitive inequality of machine entitlement and allowing only regional casinos to have category A machines will greatly favour incomers rather than the incumbent UK operators. The potential proliferation of regional casinos, with their unlimited-prize payouts, will bring them too close to centres of population, with the resultant risk of increasing problem gambling. Although I accept that it will be for local authorities to decide whether to allow regional casinos, it will be difficult for them to decline the prospect of financial benefit to their communities.

Representatives of the gaming machine companies have made suggestions to address the concerns expressed by many hon. Members about the potential proliferation of regional casinos. One suggestion is that the number of regional casinos should be restricted. The gaming machine companies have also suggested that the minimum size of the regional casinos should be increased, but that no category A slot machines should be introduced until after the second prevalence study, and then in small numbers only.

The UK gambling industry is used to maximum prizes, and the doors should not be thrown open to the unlimited cash prizes offered by category A machines without a consideration of the consequences. Category B slot machines could carry increased stakes and prizes, in which case we could maintain the principle of controlled stakes and prizes in this country. Such action would protect our home-grown gaming machine companies and the associated jobs in constituencies such as mine.

Another concern is the number of machines that will be allowed in pubs under the Bill. Although the Bill sets a maximum number of two machines by right, with more by application to the local authority, the principle of grandfather rights was established throughout the first drafts of the Bill and the submissions by the Joint Committee. Concerns have been raised because the Bill provides for grandfather rights in premises that are > "primarily for the sale of alcohol".

Does that mean that a country pub that has adapted to serve food and that may rely on the income from machines to remain viable cannot benefit from grandfather rights? What will be the definition of

> "primarily for the sale of alcohol"?

The gaming machine industry accepts that machines should be removed from non-licensed premises such as fish and chip shops and taxicab offices to ensure that children do not have access to them. However, I hope that that principle will not extend to premises such as pubs and bowling alleys, which might fall foul of the definition of

> "primarily for the sale of alcohol".

The UK has one of the best records on problem gambling and the gambling industry has been kept free from crime since the 1960s. Traditionally, we have had low-stake, low-prize machines in pubs, arcades, betting shops and a small number of casinos. It is therefore ironic that those traditionally well-regulated and socially responsible activities could be hit by the proposals in the Bill, while the Bill, as proposed, will allow an unlimited number of regional casinos with unlimited-stake and unlimited-prize machines.

I hope that Ministers will have regard to the views of home-grown industries such as those based in my constituency and accept that their interest complements the desire to maintain a gambling industry that is free from crime and that maintains its comparatively good record on problem gambling.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) and the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) for the tributes that they paid to the Joint Committee's report and to my chairmanship. In turn, may I pay tribute to the Committee and to our excellent Clerks, without whom we would not have been so effective?

I remind the House of my entries in the Register of Members' Interests as a consultant to College Hill, a public relations company whose clients include the Tote. I am also a long-standing adviser to the Institute of Sales Promotion, which supports the objective of stronger enforcement against illegal lotteries, an aspect of the Bill that no one else has mentioned.

Most of the increase in gambling in Britain today is in unregulated, remote gambling on the internet, which, surveys suggest, includes children and young people under 18. That activity is supported by wholesale advertising, which would be illegal for more traditional forms of gambling. That cannot go on. Even fixed-odds betting terminals in betting shops exist because the current law and regulations do not reflect what new technology has made possible.

Had this debate taken place six months ago, our proceedings would have been dominated by concern about betting exchanges, which were associated with allegations of race fixing. Initiatives to improve integrity, which are presently being done voluntarily, must be secured in the longer term with the passage of this Bill. The betting exchanges want such an improvement because they recognise the danger of offshore sites, which give no protection to punters, no prospect of a fair contribution to racing or other sports and unequal treatment between different sorts of betting.

The major gambling charity, Gamcare, welcomes the Bill and supports the Committee's view that "should the Bill be delayed, or even fail, the volume, availability and complexity of gambling would continue to grow but with no commensurate increase in the services which Gamcare provides."

It knows that protection and prohibition are two different things and that prohibition leads to illegality with no protection at all. Many of our leading charities, including the hospice movement, want the Bill to help to protect the income stream that they enjoy from lotteries. In Committee, hon. Members must pay attention to the reworded provisions on illegal lotteries masquerading as prize competitions.

During our visit to Blackpool, Churches and faith groups told us that they welcome the proposals for resort casinos as a means to create jobs and restore Blackpool's economic fortunes through better hotels, theatres, restaurants and other entertainment. Our visit left us in no doubt about the importance of a proper partnership between the casino operators and the local community in securing genuine and lasting regeneration, which would be undermined by the proliferation of major casino developments in the communities from which Blackpool traditionally draws its visitors.

That danger of proliferation has attracted most of the current criticism. The outcome of our first report was to remove many of the potential dangers in the initial White Paper. The concept of the third category of casino—the regional casino—with a maximum of 1,250 gaming machines also results from the first report. I am disappointed that the Government have not accepted the framework for regional casinos that we offered in our second report, which I still believe provides a sound basis from which to proceed.

A mistaken perception exists that every new casino development will be a Las Vegas-style regional casino, which is not what much of the industry wants or wanted. However, the decision announced in June not to allow existing casinos any entitlement to unlimited-prize category A machines has had the perverse consequence of encouraging UK operators to ratchet up their plans to develop large regional casinos. The Committee saw that coming, which is why we recommended that the Government should not concentrate on limiting the number of casinos with category A machines, but instead should focus on how many of those machines will be available in aggregate, where they will be located and who will operate them.

Are category A machines more harmful? No one knows. They are certainly untested in the UK market, and we need proper research based on their operation. It is not strictly necessary for a regional casino to have 1,250 machines all in category A. As Mr. Tobin Prior of Kerzner Casinos admitted to us,

"there is a misplaced fear that all Category A machines are going to have some amazingly high jackpot which is going to lead to compulsive behaviour which is not borne out in reality. It is not a sustainable business strategy and a mix of lower frequency lower pay out machines will predominate on the gaming floor in the £10,000 to £20,000 pay out category."

The Committee saw those volumes, albeit in euros, during our visit to France. Of course, even a £10,000 payout is five times the £2,000 maximum that is currently available on category B machines in casinos and which the Government intend to retain.

The Government have the opportunity to achieve several objectives by making relatively modest amendments to the Bill. First, as the Committee recommended, they could increase the category B maximum payout to at least £5,000, or perhaps £10,000. That could be done through the regulations. Secondly, they could restrict the number of category A machines in regional casinos to no more than, say, 250—a fifth—with the rest being category B and C. That could be achieved by amending clause 163(3). The Government's decision to limit the number of premises with unlimited-prize category A machines would be preserved, but there would be greater fairness to the existing industry, as well as a removal of much of the incentive in favour of big regional casino developments that might lead to more modest proposals.

However, changes to machine entitlements alone will not be enough to convince a sceptical public that Britain is not about to become the Las Vegas of Europe. I doubt whether there is a market for more than 20 regional casinos over the next 10 years. My preference would be for national strategy to achieve no more than that number, not through a cap in the Bill, but through a planning strategy. The likely locations are already well known, and guidance to regional planning bodies could limit numbers to two casinos per region, with perhaps three or four in London, making 20 in all. That could be achieved through planning policy statement 6. It is essential to prevent anyone from circumventing planning policy by introducing a separate planning category for regional casinos. I warmly welcome the Secretary of State's remarks about that.

Planning guidance needs to err on the side of caution and to reflect the fact that regional super-casinos should not—must not—be located in largely residential areas or be included in mixed-use developments, including new housing. I therefore warmly welcome the Government's decision to allow local councils not to issue any new casino licences in their district. Conservative councillors are now predominant in local government, and I am confident that they will have the wisdom to implement that where appropriate. The Minister may laugh, but I say that because one would think from reading some of the newspapers that they are incapable of making decisions. That is not so. There is a snag, however. If they say no to all casinos, that is fine, but if they say yes to one or two they could end up with significantly more. The Government still have not addressed the danger of the floodgates opening to a larger number and the problems of saturation that that would bring. Such saturation would undermine the statutory objectives of the gambling commission, which should be the focus of everything that we decide to do through the Bill.

The Government, across all Departments, must give priority to the Bill's statutory objectives; otherwise, they will not succeed in what they wish to do. If there is cross-departmental co-operation on the issue of planning and control, there is no reason why the Bill should not succeed in its joint aims of strengthening the protection of children and the vulnerable while allowing new opportunities that are sensibly controlled and robustly regulated.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who made an excellent contribution to the debate. His comments injected a certain sense of reality, especially in relation to the numbers of regional casinos, and highlighted the need for the Bill to be given a Second Reading and allowed to go into Committee, where all the issues can be debated in full.

I shall not detain the House for long, but I should mention at the outset that I am honorary adviser to the northern Licensed Victuallers Association.

One of the problems that many of my hon. Friends have faced in relation to the Bill is that it is based 90 per cent. on regulation and 10 per cent. on new forms of gambling. The obvious worry is that we may give a green light to increasing problem gambling. I was pleased to hear the hon. Member for Ryedale give a sensible explanation of what his Committee has done. We are faced with a situation in which the Bill has become necessary. As many hon. Members said, it is required for the purposes of regulation, especially in relation to remote and internet gambling. We have heard examples of young people being able to access gambling through the internet; that activity appears to be completely unregulated.

I am concerned about regional super-casinos being used for regeneration purposes, especially if we are to end up with 40 of them. I am glad that the hon. Member for Ryedale thinks that there will be a maximum of 20. Leeds is the nearest city to me with a casino. There would be perhaps two or three super-casinos in a city of that size. Leeds could not accommodate that; the demand simply would not be there. Operators would be unlikely to start building these things to compete with each other in a city of that size because they would not want to involve themselves in that amount of competition. I presume that the same would apply in Liverpool, Manchester and Birmingham.

Mr. Marshall: My hon. Friend mentions cities of a comparable size to Leeds. My city of Glasgow, which is one such, already has six casinos, and plans are in the pipeline—two are already in the public domain—for five massive casinos. Far from regenerating the city, they will degenerate it. Does my hon. Friend share my concern about that?

Mr. Illsley: I certainly do. I cannot for the life of me see how a city the size of Glasgow would cope with 11 casinos, five or six of which will be super-casinos. I cannot understand how operators could create so many; it is the economics of madness to suggest that they are likely to want to compete to that extent.

Miss Kirkbride: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Illsley: No. I have given way already and will not do so again.

If we use the legislation sensibly we can steer ourselves towards a limit by way of the economic and planning aspects. That is the obvious way in which to achieve a cap—it does not need to be included in the Bill.

I have a great deal of sympathy with hon. Members' comments on regeneration. Casinos may not create huge numbers of jobs in themselves, but other developments such as restaurants and hotels will follow on.

I am worried by the idea of destination casinos. It seems strange that people who want to gamble in, say, south Yorkshire, should have to travel some distance to Blackpool or another such resort to gain access to such places. I would support their being situated in regions around the country, not restricted to seaside locations.

My other points resemble those made by my hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) on the so-called grandfather rights of existing establishments in regard to their provision of slot machines. Some organisations are concerned that pubs, clubs and other facilities that provide such machines will be discriminated against due to the increasing value of the new machines being introduced. Many of these organisations believe that they are likely to be regulated and will lose the existing facility to keep their machines. Many clubs—working men's clubs, private members' clubs, and so on—rely on this type of machine for a substantial part of their income and, if the Bill gets into Committee, I would ask hon. Members to examine the effect on existing establishments of the new proposals.

I have noticed in the Bill the provision for reducing the prizes in amusement-with-prizes machines from £8 to £5 and to cap the prizes at that maximum. I have some sympathy with the arguments of those hon. Members who represent seaside constituencies that introducing such a small prize could be a retrograde step. I hope that the House gives the Bill a Second Reading this evening, because there is a lot in it that is essential, and a lot that can be worked out in Committee if we take a sensible approach to it.

Mr. Richard Page (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): In my office, there are two piles of paper. One is approaching 2 ft high; the other has just gone past the 1 ft barrier. I have not had any matter brought before me in my capacity as a Member of Parliament over the years that has generated so much paper and so much enthusiasm as this legislation and the work that has flowed from it.

I am not a fan of this Government. In fact, I do not trust them too much, and I do not have much faith in them. They have done one thing, however, that has brought great advantages: they have introduced the consultative Committee work on Bills that are going to come before the House. I served on the Joint Committee and I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) for the effective way in which he chaired it. He jollied us along with good humour and made sure that there were no conflicts or arguments, and a unanimous report was the result each time. He is to be congratulated on that. The task was made more difficult by the fact that we did not have a full Bill to start with. It came along in dribs and drabs, which illustrates the difficulty that the drafting team at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport had in getting the full Bill to us. Eventually, however, we got it.

The argument as to why we should do something about these issues has been fully made. Those who feel that we should leave things as they are and do nothing are living in cloud cuckoo land. The internet is with us, and there is internet gambling. There is even virtual reality racing, which is one of the saddest things that I have ever seen in my life, but some people must bet on it. We also have betting exchanges. These are reasons why we have to have the Bill, but we need considerably greater assurance than we have had so far.

Out there in the world, there is an immense income to be made from betting and gaming. If this country has the right regulations, we will get that world business. Without that control, however, we will lose it. It is far better that those regulations should be controlled in this country through the integrity that comes from our laws; if they were, it would be of benefit to everyone and we could go forward.

The Gaming Board has done a very good job over the years, but technology has moved on, and we have to move on. The gambling commission is required, and the sooner it comes into force the better. I hope that the Government will make available sufficient money to enable it to be up and running when the Bill becomes law. One reason why we need these changes is that, for the first time, betting exchanges can trace a bet right the way through the piece. They can find out who put the money on, and to see that there is an integrity in gambling. That has not been the case before. However, they need the resources to be able to follow that up. In the past, the Jockey Club, for example, has not had the resources to enable it to do this vital work, so we welcome the proposals on that issue.

Along with everyone else, I welcome the setting up of support for problem gamblers. My only objection is to the exciting name for the organisation in question: the Responsibility in Gambling Trust does not exactly trip off the tongue, although I very much welcome the fact that it is to be chaired by Sir David Durie, who was a very effective official at the Department of Trade and Industry when I was there.

Concerns about the whole question of gambling have been expressed today and, for me, this boils down to the argument about freedom of choice versus state diktat. There are close similarities between these arguments and those relating to the production and sale of alcohol. The role of the state is surely to ensure that the activity is properly regulated and to provide care and help for those who cannot cope. The Responsibility in Gambling Trust will be able to do that well, because it will have the advantage of funding and the ability to introduce a statutory levy if required. I am very much in favour of the setting up of the new trust.

There has been a lot of confusion about category A machines. People have the idea that there are going to be 1,250 such machines in each of the resort casinos, but that is absolutely untrue. There will be a range of machines. Not everyone will want to put in £5, £2 or whatever, to try to win £3 million. There will not be 1,250 machines designed for that in every casino; there will be a range of machines.

We must also look carefully at the existing casinos and raise their limits considerably, because we do not want them to ratchet up their operations to try to become destination casinos in their own right. That would bring about a huge proliferation in gambling. We put £1 on the lottery to try to win several million. I see no difference between that and allowing the smaller casinos to have much larger limits on their payouts. People know that if they put in their £1, they are more likely to win £10 than £10 million. That is common sense.

In the short time that I have left, I want to talk about the present media frenzy. The Government have only themselves to blame in this regard. The Joint Committee that scrutinised the Bill in its draft form made it abundantly clear that the Government had not got their act together on national guidance for regional leisure and destination casinos. The DCMS had one set of priorities, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister had another, and the Treasury was, as usual, lurking in the background with its own aims and objectives. Our report highlighted those conflicts, but unfortunately, they have not been adequately resolved. In our final submission to the Government, we said:

> "While we acknowledge the Government's reluctance to publish national guidance relating specifically to regional leisure/destination casinos, we believe that it could help to ensure a consistent approach between regional authorities and avoid the need for applications to be called in".

In their response, the Government said that they accept

> "that national planning policy guidance should, where it is appropriate, deal with casinos . . . and the two joint statements already provide a comprehensive policy framework."

That is not strictly true; it is misleading and I believe that it is completely responsible for the situation that we find ourselves in today. That is why the Government have the wrath of the media on their head, and why a great many hon. Members are so concerned. The confusion over the location and number of casinos likely to be built is just one of the consequences of that. Inadequate guidance offered over planning policies and lack of detail over the prospective regulatory regime have led to wild statements in the press and widespread public concern.

The Secretary of State has already made some concessions. Those may not be enough, however. The long-standing confusion remains. In 2003, the Government were claiming that the market would determine the location, number, size and character of casinos. In June this year, they were saying that their strategy was > "based upon the direction of regional casinos to the most suitable areas."

That is a U-turn in anyone's language.

I do not believe that the contradictions in the Government's position have yet been adequately resolved. On the one hand, they have been arguing since the summer that is likely, even though The Times revealed on Saturday that at least 41 out of the 172 casinos currently being planned will fall into that category. The Secretary of State has said that local authorities can say no. But what happens if local authorities say yes, yes and yes? What will control the numbers and the applications that come through?

> "a relatively low number of regional casinos"

In the event of conflicts between regional planning bodies or development agencies and local authorities, I can see that the decision will end up being taken in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister—the very thing that Ministers have said consistently that they do not want to happen. I am afraid that it is order, counter-order and disorder. I return to the issue of lack of trust—this Government cannot be trusted on this matter. I cannot agree to a flood of casinos, and until I see the specifics of protection on numbers in relation to regional policy, I regret that I must vote against the Bill.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): First, I very much welcome the Bill, which will offer protections for children and the vulnerable, set up the gambling commission, and introduce all the modern regulation that is needed in today's gambling industry. People have been debating this Bill as if it existed in a vacuum—as if the world has not changed. Well, the world has changed since the last piece of legislation on the matter in 1968. We must have this Bill, with all its regulations and protections.

Later in my speech, I will raise some of my specific concerns about regional casinos, but the debate should not be hijacked by such concerns, and unless we give this Bill a Second Reading, all its good aspects will be lost. Many Members who have said that they will vote against Second Reading have also anticipated later discussions and put in bids for aspects that they want changed. To me that is illogical. It is not the stance that we should take.

The nature of Second Reading debates means that we tend to gloss over the aspects of a Bill that we like, and concentrate on those areas about which we have concerns. The Minister will not therefore be entirely surprised if I mention one or two matters that will need further consideration as the Bill proceeds.

First, I have been contacted by some bingo operators in Blackpool who are concerned about section 21 games and whether they will continue to be allowed to offer them, as they are not games of equal chance, as set out in the legislation. Equally, they have drawn my attention to mechanical cash bingo, which they think will be caught by the new machine classification. Finally, they are concerned about the issue of retaining roll-overs so that they can generate high prizes, which was proposed by Budd, and confirmed in the White Paper, but is not mentioned in the Bill. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will consider that kind of detail.

We have heard some interesting contributions about regional casinos this evening and I want to concentrate on how they could be harnessed for regeneration purposes. I was reassured when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that she expected only 20 to 40 regional casinos to be built. But why does she expect only 20 to 40, how does she expect that, and where does she expect them to be? There are some genuine concerns about proliferation.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Is not the crux of the matter that regional super-casinos could be regulated through planning or other measures, and that such measures could be introduced in Committee? Tonight, therefore, we should give the Bill its Second Reading, and concentrate all our efforts on making sure that we prevent such super-casinos from being created. As the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) suggested, powers are available to do that.

Mrs. Humble: I can throw away the rest of my speech, as that is exactly what I will suggest to the Minister.

I have talked to my constituents in Blackpool about the development of what were originally resort casinos, what they would prefer to be destination casinos, and what are currently called regional casinos. Interestingly, they would only want them in the town if they were part of a genuine regeneration effort. Blackpool council is to be applauded, as it conducted an extensive consultation exercise back in 2002, as did our local newspaper, The Gazette, and people were fairly evenly split on whether they were in favour of resort casinos coming to Blackpool. When they were asked about the regeneration potential, however, the number of those in favour went up markedly.

The other question is: what do we mean by regeneration? No definition of regeneration has been offered and I would urge both Ministers in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and their colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to provide one. To me, regeneration means attracting new jobs, new schools and new opportunities, and it must be part of a much wider package. We cannot just build developments—development and regeneration are different. New regional casinos are different from swimming pools, ice rinks or velodromes, which can just be deposited in areas of a town or city—casinos are large complexes offering entertainment 24 hours a day, with large high-value jackpot machines. They are major enterprises and must be part of a much larger plan to achieve the regeneration for which my constituents would look.

The Government are relying on regional planning organisations through their regional spatial strategies, but I must ask the Minister whether that is enough. In the north-west, I am pleased that the regional development agency, the regional assembly and the Government office for the north-west have come together and commissioned a research paper, from which they will develop an interim policy framework, which will help inform their regional spatial strategy. Are other regions doing the same? What happens if individual policy framework documents conflict with each other? How will the RSS interact in different regions? The Government should consider developing a national policy framework within which regional planning bodies can operate. If we are given a definition of regeneration, we can all work from it, and the process will offer transparency.

I was going to mention concerns about use class orders, but I am pleased about the Secretary of State's announcement earlier, and her statement about pulling together a policy document before new casinos are allowed. There was a real fear that some casino developers would take advantage of the lack of existing planning rules, and sneak in their proposals via local authorities that would welcome whatever money they could get. I spent 12 years in local government, yet I find myself saying—for perhaps the first time in this place—that local authorities should not necessarily have that key role, because it could lead to a proliferation of large casinos. There must be a national strategy and a regional perspective, but of course, it is local authorities that could and should consult their local communities, and which understand them best.

But even if the RSS worked properly, if agreement were then reached at regional level to have as many as seven large regional casinos in each area, 90 per cent. of people in this country would be half an hour away from such a casino. How can regeneration be achieved on the back of that? We must also consider concerns about the resulting proliferation of gambling. If those who might be addicted to gambling are half an hour away from a large regional casino, the dangers associated with such addiction will be greatly increased. Some in Blackpool have argued to the Joint Committee that destination casinos can address that problem. When people have to travel further, they plan how they are going to spend their time and money. That would be a much better system, and hopefully it would address some of the concerns that many Members have expressed.

If we can deal with planning and look again at destination casinos, we can allay many fears and build on what local communities want. My hon. Friends have been waiting for me to mention Blackpool—[Interruption.] And Fleetwood. Blackpool is unique among local authorities and it is still the premier resort in the country. It has spent five years developing a strategic master plan that incorporates not only casinos, but other businesses and the public and private sectors. It is also looking to expand airports and other transport mechanisms. It is into precisely such settings that regional casinos should be placed to enhance what resorts have to offer and provide jobs for local communities and a better tourism product.

Surely we should be using the Bill to link RDAs' regeneration plans, regional tourism strategies and local government frameworks. The report shows that Blackpool—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): The hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) expressed fairly and clearly the dangers that many of us feel could arise from regional casinos. The most worrying aspect of this debate is that neither the Government nor anyone else have made a convincing case as to why we require such casinos at all; nor have they explained convincingly that we can be certain that casinos will not impact adversely on communities.

We need to look at the evidence in considering the unwelcome and unreasonably optimistic view that this proposition will somehow bring great benefits. Some 25 years ago, the inhabitants of Atlantic City, in New Jersey, were told that wonderful things would happen if they went in for the big casinos. They were told that things would be terrific—that what was a pleasant and prosperous little place would become very exciting. In fact, in the first nine years following their introduction, crime rose not by 10 or 20 per cent., but by 107 per cent. Businesses closed down all over the place, and the number of hotels reduced dramatically. Where before there were 2,100 hotels and businesses in Atlantic City, now, only 60 independent hotels remain. Unemployment, far from disappearing, got into a bad way. In 2002, unemployment in New Jersey as a whole was running at only 3.8 per cent., but in Atlantic City it was 9.9 per cent. What was promised to be great proved not to be great at all.

Why on earth are we doing this, and if we are going to do it, why not try out such casinos in one place—Blackpool, for example—to see what the impact is? My fear is that we will do enormous damage to existing casinos. I represent Southend-on-Sea, which has three casinos. I was not terribly happy when the first one came, but in fairness, thanks to the activities of the current and previous Governments, gambling in Britain is run in a remarkable way, and more sensibly and properly than in almost any other country. As someone who lives locally and who travels quite a bit, I have not received a single complaint about any of the three casinos, except for complaints from two people who claimed that they had been excluded from them because of bad behaviour. Those casinos operate on the basis that people cannot simply walk in. They have to be members and to apply for membership 24 hours beforehand, and if they do not follow the rules they can be excluded.

[Sir Teddy Taylor]

I hope that the Government realise that thanks to their efforts and those of the previous Government, we have an extremely good system that works very well indeed and produces a great deal of employment and growth. The gaming and betting industry employs 82,000 people, and last year it generated an income of £1.76 billion. It is a big industry that works extremely well. I hope that the Government will say whether they have given any thought to the impact on existing casinos—of which there are many—of these dramatic new regional casinos. Such casinos are huge and will cost a fortune. If they offer massive prizes from their wonderful machines—one Member congratulated the Government on ensuring that they will contain only 1,250 such machines—the effect on existing casinos could be devastating. That does not seem sensible. Why on earth are we going for such a major change without trying it out first?

Some people will say that there are those who always object to change and who are unduly pessimistic. But we should try out such casinos in one place to see what their impact is. Will they help to revive communities and bring new and exciting prospects, or will they damage existing businesses? My fear, as a pessimist, is that it is not a good idea. If we go ahead with what are a substantial number of regional casinos, the effect could be devastating. Of course, they could also increase the amount of gambling; indeed, in order to pay for the new premises, there would have to be a huge increase in gambling.

I am sorry that this is not a free-vote issue. Most Members to whom I speak—from all parts of the House—think this a very unusual move. I hope that the Government will endeavour to give us a reason why we should go ahead with this plan, and to explain why it would not be better to try out such casinos in one area, to see what the implications are. My fear is that, as often happens, the long-term effect could be very serious, and one that we will live to regret.

There is one more point that I wish briefly to make, concerning the Bill's impact on existing operations in Southend. Like many seaside towns, Southend has lots of arcades. The impression that I gained was that under the proposed minor changes, young people would not be able to use certain machines. Such a proposal seemed very unusual indeed. Apparently, young people were to be prevented from using category D machines, such as cranes that grab toys, coin pusher games involving 10p and 2p coins, and redemption machines that issue tickets as prizes.

The Government then explained that those activities would not be prevented, but that they wanted reserve powers, which could be brought in, if necessary. I wonder whether the Government think that that is sensible. How would they like to run a business employing many people and spending much money, if all the time they were subject to the danger of a Government bringing in new regulations that could put them out of business? It seems to me that that is a daft proposal and that it should be scrapped in Committee.

I apologise to Members for going on far too long [HON. MEMBERS: "No."], but I hope that both sides of the House can agree that the proposal for regional casinos could be madness and could be daft. It could do great damage if we go ahead with those casinos without careful and precise planning. Why not have a trial operation before we make the great change? I believe that that provides the best way forward.

Mr. Anthony D. Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab): First, I want to express my admiration for the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who chaired the Joint Committee.

Over the past few weeks, considerable criticism—some justified, some not—has surrounded the publication of the Bill. I was a member of the pre-legislative scrutiny Committee and I certainly found the whole exercise very positive in helping to create, by and large, a good Bill. I remain cautious, however, about some of the Bill's provisions and I will want amendments in certain areas before I give it my wholehearted support.

One of the criticisms is that the Bill is being rushed through, but I do not accept that. To counter it, I would say that, over the past 30 or 40 years, the gambling laws have been tidied as deemed necessary at the time. For instance, when casinos were first permitted in the early 1960s there were more than 1,000 of them, but serious problems about their legitimacy led to their being regulated and reduced to a realistic number soon afterwards. According to Library statistics, we now have some 131 casinos.

Another review was conducted at the time of the Gaming Act 1968, but it was not until the mid-1990s that it became apparent that serious reform was required. Indeed, it could be said that the Gambling Bill before us now was initiated in 1996 by the Gaming Board's call for substantial reform of the 1968 Act. In March 1997, the then Conservative Government were in the process of significant deregulation of the casino industry via two deregulation orders, which were introduced to avoid the need for primary legislation. It is worth noting that a significant element of those orders was to increase the number of casinos in the UK by 21 without primary legislation, so I am surprised by the Leader of the Opposition's current stance, especially given that he was Home Secretary at the time.

The Bill clearly provides more protection for the vulnerable and children while allowing for a more regulated industry, coupled with possible regeneration of many areas of the UK. The safeguards and benefits have largely been absent from previous reforms. Fortunately, the general election stopped the Conservatives' proposals for 21 more casinos being passed without the proper scrutiny of primary legislation, hence the Bill before us today.

After the election, the Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), announced that there would be no change in respect of permitted areas and their extension, but did accept that minor changes, such as the ability to join a casino by post, were acceptable. The Gaming Board still urged major reform, spurred mainly by technological progress and by people's ability to gamble in a less regulated and protected environment through the relatively new betting exchanges, remote gambling and betting on horse racing via TV from the comfort of their own homes. In other words, we were in an era of 24-hour, seven-days-a-week gambling, much of which was unregulated.

When the Gaming Act was enacted in 1968, none of those technologies was available. The original scope of the Act addressed the issues very well, but the industry has moved on. I was pleased, therefore, when, in 1999, the Home Secretary announced the setting up of an independent review body to look into all aspects of the gambling industry, which led to the publication of the Budd report in 2001. After significant consultation, the pre-legislative scrutiny Committee was formed last year and reported earlier this year, leading to the Bill before us today. I certainly do not intend to go into too much detail, as many right hon. and hon. Members either have, or will, raise their particular issues of concern. I intend to be brief to allow other hon. Members to express their views.

The concept of resort, regional or destination casinos, as the Committee wanted to call them, provides an opportunity for the regeneration of many areas of the UK, particularly seaside resorts, by enabling local authorities to make gains from section 106 moneys for other add-on facilities. However, the number of casinos must be restricted: it is no good allowing market forces to dictate how many and where they will be put. There must be an element of direction, and I suggest that a maximum of two resort casinos in each region would be more than enough, as they would represent a fair geographical spread of the investment. Perhaps as an interim measure, we could restrict the number to one per region.

That investment would result from regional planning bodies being able to determine the permitted areas, taking into account the regional economic strategy and, just as importantly, discussion and consultation with the local planning body and the local community. If we allow market forces to determine the location of resort casinos, without a regional spread, I will certainly have to consider whether I can support this part of the Bill.

Another area of concern that directly affects my constituency and those of many other hon. Members are the new restrictions on existing family amusement centres, which have been an integral part of the British seaside resort for many years. I can remember when I was a child visiting the amusement arcades during the summer months. Even then, anyone under 14 was summarily kicked out by the attendant for being under age—not that I was, of course, I hasten to add.

In my view, the British Amusement and Catering Trades Association's code of conduct protects children, who will not, I believe, face any more risk of becoming problem gamblers under the Bill. Currently, children under 16 have to be accompanied by an adult, which provides even more insurance that such venues will not turn children into the problem gamblers of tomorrow. I am sure that there will be some isolated cases against that argument, but the experience and knowledge that I have gained from having lived in Great Yarmouth all my life lead me to believe that these centres are an accepted, well regulated and necessary part of the British seaside resort.

Another matter of concern is the restriction to be placed on family amusement centres, which could reduce their viability. Members of the Joint Committee visited Blackpool and Great Yarmouth and found that one problem relates to category D machines and the new definition of "amusement with prizes". It is proposed to lower prizes to a maximum of £5 instead of the current £8, and to reduce the maximum stake for cash machines to 10p from the current 30p maximum. There is no evidence to suggest that problems are being created for children or for whoever plays these machines. I would certainly welcome funding for a report to look further into that matter. Another issue is the protection of existing amusement centres through "grandfather rights"—a matter of great concern to many working in the industry at seaside resorts. Those and other issues must be dealt with in Committee.

Overall, it would be foolish for us not to agree with many of the measures that the Bill will introduce. Recent negative press reports have whipped up hysteria based on fears rather than facts and have done no service to the debate on a serious issue. Indeed, comments from across the spectrum—from the industry itself to the charities that deal with problem gamblers—have welcomed many of the Bill's proposals, which in some cases give real protection to the vulnerable in our society and to children for the first time. The critics tell us that if the Bill goes through, it will create another "Australian model" with a huge increase in problem gambling, when the truth is that there is more chance of the Australian model coming to the UK if the Bill fails.

I have already outlined some of the changes that I want, and other changes will follow. I am confident that we will end up with a Bill that not only delivers what the Gaming Board asked for back in 1996–97—more protection for children and the vulnerable—but takes into account much of the technological advance that we have seen since. It will also provide real opportunities for regeneration. I shall support the Bill on Second Reading, but I will press for amendments on the issues that I have highlighted—unless, of course, the Tories and Liberals have their way and stop the Second Reading. In that case, there will be no Bill and no further protection for children and the vulnerable from such problems as internet gambling.

7.9 pm

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): My colleagues and I will vote against Second Reading for the reasons set out in our reasoned amendment. I want to say something about the tenor of the Bill, and the philosophy behind it, that is more personal than political.

I find the Bill deeply unsatisfactory. I intend no disrespect to the Joint Committee, which did a good job of scrutinising the Government's proposals and the Budd report. It is dispiriting that we have a Government who set out a vision of being a world leader in all fields of gambling activity, because it shows poverty of imagination and leadership.

One thing that we have not acknowledged in the debate so far is the harm that gambling does to society and to families throughout the country. We have mentioned the 300,000 problem gamblers as though they were some select group of people whom we can put to one side and treat separately. Gambling pervades society, and it harms society.

Governments are no longer prepared to tolerate the harm caused by alcohol and tobacco, yet the Government are prepared to be lobbied and bullied into extending and facilitating gambling, which is very dispiriting and unfortunate. The mothers and fathers of socialism would find it particularly dispiriting. It is not patronising, elitist or snobbish to stand up and say that gambling harms society and the poor and the working class disproportionately—indeed, when one did so it used to be called socialism and fighting for one's class and a better society. Now, the Government are smuggling through the back door a change in regulation that will control and alter the way in which we run society, which is very unfortunate.

It is also deeply dispiriting that the Government's vision of the regeneration of our seaside towns is based on making money from gambling—from a mug's game, by fleecing people. We are considering regeneration not based on education, skills, manufacturing, libraries or culture but built on gambling. What a lack of imagination. What a poor state we are in when the only thing we can offer our decaying seaside towns, including some in my constituency, is regeneration based on gambling and on taking from those who do not have and giving it to those who have plenty.

People talk of reality and say, "Support the Bill. It's only 20 or 40 super-casinos—nothing much." The reality is that gambling is already growing exponentially. Last year alone, 12 million people gambled via the red button on the Sky interactive service. Gambling is being introduced into our homes, making it easier than ever before to participate. Before long, it will be possible to gamble on a mobile phone. [Hon. Members: "It is now."] Perhaps it is; it is not something that I use. Where are the controls on young people's access to that? There is increasing evidence that suicide, bankruptcy and domestic violence have risen in towns and cities where casinos have opened.

The Government say that the purpose of the Bill is to regulate the growth in remote, online gambling, but the basic question is whether such gambling should be happening in the first place—whether it is good for society. Any Government, and certainly the House of Commons, should be asking that question. Should we not be thinking of different ways to tackle the problem? We live in a society where debt is increasing by £1 million every four minutes. While I am on my feet for my 10-minute speech, there will be a £2.5 million increase in personal debt in this country.

Mr. Banks: Sit down then.

Mr. Thomas: No doubt personal debt will increase even more if the hon. Gentleman gets his way and makes a speech, as people are driven out to gamble.

Gambling is founded on misery and on broken dreams for many, and it is a broken dream for a Government to promote it. Let us look at some of the parts of the Bill. We are told that we will see only 20 to 40 super-casinos, but that is a margin of error of 100 per cent. I cannot trust such figures. We are talking about a 1 or 2 per cent. margin in the US presidential election, so why should we trust a margin of 100 per cent.? If the gates have opened, I have no doubt that lobbyists will force the legislation through. Super-casinos will do for gambling what super-pubs have done for binge drinking. They will increase gambling rates and the amount of problem gambling. Allowing super-casinos to provide some form of regeneration is like expecting supermarkets to regenerate our town centres—it ain't going to happen.

The Government talk about a triple lock on the development of super-casinos. From what I see in the Bill, that lock will be about as effective as a Krooklok on a dodgy Ford Escort in an unlit car park. There needs to be considerable strengthening of regulation of super-casinos. In particular I want local authorities to be able to say no, not for three years before facing court cases, pressure and lobbying, but on behalf of their populations and for it to mean no. I want membership of casinos to remain a requirement, although perhaps not 24-hour membership. I do not want alcohol to be served at gaming tables, because that befuddles people's minds and leads to more betting. Lines of credit should not be offered in super-casinos either. That would merely facilitate people's reliance on gambling. We should look again at grandfather rights, too. Perhaps we shall have an indication of that happening.

Online betting is growing. I know that because I received some spam e-mail from The Daily Telegraph on Friday, which said:

> "Dear Simon, Try your hand at fantasy poker today. If the image of smoky back rooms and high-stakes are putting you off playing poker, then playing online might be just right for you . . .
> Online poker rooms offer a safe environment to learn and practise.
> Online poker rooms suit women well"—

I do not know why the e-mail was sent to me—

> "they are encouraged by the low stakes and low commitment. Women's personality traits give them an advantage in poker."

There is no way that The Daily Telegraph could have known in sending me that e-mail, encouraging me to link to an online gambling site, that I was over 18 years old. Instead of asking whether we should regulate such betting, we should be asking ourselves whether it should be possible at all. At the moment, online gambling based on a UK website is illegal. Perhaps we should keep it that way. People would not lose their money online—fine. We should not be making it easier for people to gamble in that way.

I want also to address the problem of lotteries, because the Bill could have an effect on good-cause lotteries. I have been contacted by Tŷ Hafan children's hospice in Wales, which is concerned about pseudo-lotteries—the sort of thing on television that plays a video of Robbie Williams singing "Radio" and invites people to phone in at £1.50 a minute to name his latest single. That is supposed to be a competition; that is a lottery.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): What is it?

Mr. Thomas: "Radio". I have just mentioned it; the hon. Gentleman was not listening. Such prize-based competitions that are heavily promoted on television are a form of gambling. The Bill addresses that, but I want to ensure that it makes such gambling much more difficult to engage in.

We heard from the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) about family and holiday centres. I share some of his concerns about places such as Quay West in my constituency where gaming is not the primary purpose. We need to see what happens. The Joint Committee suggested that an evidence-based report be commissioned on what happens when children enter such places. I agree with that suggestion.

The Bill represents a return to Victorian values—that is the pattern that is emerging. The Licensing Act 2003 promoted binge drinking, and this Bill promotes easy gambling. We will see what happens about smoking. It is curious that the Government are thinking of banning smoking around gaming tables while making it easier to gamble. That shows that the nanny state has got its knickers in a twist.

The Secretary of State is dealing the cards of regulation and asking us to look at what is being done to protect children under the Bill—her card trick—but we should be looking at the magicians' cabinet behind her. In there lies the spectre of more gambling, more problems and more harm to society. I very much hope that a true socialist, a true Labour person and anyone who believes in a better society will reject the Bill tonight.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I say to hon. Members who are desirous of catching my eye that it would be useful if they stood to speak in their usual places?

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): I approach the debate in something of a dilemma. I am sorry that I did not pay more attention to what was happening during pre-legislative scrutiny. I have a seaside resort in my constituency and, when Mr. Budd's report was first published, I wrote a piece for one of my local papers in which I stated that I did not believe that the Budd concept of mega-casinos would help in the regeneration of a seaside town in south Wales. After examining the Bill last week I wrote another article, which was for Labour party members. It stated that I did not believe that the proposals for super-casinos in the Bill would help to regenerate Porthcawl or any other town in my constituency.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend believe that we would benefit from trials of perhaps four super-casinos, in, for example, Blackpool, which has an airport, and that they should constitute the only trials in the country?

Mr. Griffiths: I have signed the early-day motion that proposed a trial, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) tabled. Four is excessive. Ideally, we should not have super-casinos at all, but if the Government genuinely want to test the concept let us go for it in one resort, perhaps two in extremis. I am a Methodist and my Church suggested to me that there are many good things in the Bill, for example, regulating new forms of betting and strengthening some of the regulation on existing forms. However, when I listened to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I had the feeling that the Government would not change their minds about some of the provisions to which I would support significant change. For example, although it is not acceptable to me, some hon. Members would accept a cap of 20 to 40 mega-casinos. I would not accept that, but the Government were not even prepared to accept the need for a cap.

I find myself in the position of supporting the better regulation of new and existing forms of gambling but totally opposing anything that would allow mega-casinos to get a toe hold in the United Kingdom. It is as though a farmer had decided to repair all the fences in his field to protect his animals, but simultaneously decided to make a huge gap in all the better hedges to allow the animals to roam wherever they please.

I am moving towards voting against Second Reading. My original idea was to make a speech and say that the Bill contained good provisions that must be supported, others that were terrible and that I could not support, but that it should be allowed to proceed to Committee and, if the changes that I supported were not accepted, I would vote against Third Reading. However, from what I have heard this evening the prospect of significant change in Committee is diminishing.

I have been a Member of Parliament for some years and I know how Committees are composed. The idea of the Government appointing a majority of Members who want the changes that I support will not be realised. While I remain on the horns of a dilemma, I must tell my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and Tourism that I am inclining towards voting against Second Reading.

The polls on whether sufficient gambling opportunities exist show that most people believe that they do. Most people also believe that if we provide further gambling opportunities, we will create further gambling problems. When we consider the aid that is available through voluntary effort—organisations such as Gamblers Anonymous and GamCare do fantastic work—and the pitiful contribution of Governments to that since we have had casino gambling, I have to take with a pinch of salt the letters that I have read about how the industry will put money into trying to counsel people who experience problems to ensure that they do not become problem gamblers. The efforts that are made to tackle problem drinking are inadequate and getting worse rather than better. Even if the proposals are tweaked here and there, they will result in gambling problems for more people.

The fixed-odds betting terminals are a disaster in that they encourage people to bet. We will allow them, if not to proliferate, to be available in plenty of places with a modicum of regulation.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): A figure of 300,000 is used for the number of problem gamblers. Does my hon. Friend agree that not only they but their families are affected and that the problem is perhaps greater than it is presented?

Mr. Griffiths: Yes. To those 300,000-plus people, one has to add at least three or four family members who are damaged by the process. Beyond that, others are affected. I am therefore sceptical about our ability to say, "Look, we're only acting like mature adults in giving people an opportunity to gamble in regulated circumstances. We'll make sure that they won't get into any severe gambling problems." The evidence is to the contrary.

[Mr. Griffiths]

I am surprised—having been on the fringe of developments and given the amount of pre-legislative scrutiny that the draft Bill received—that so many people are dissatisfied with the final product. Perhaps the Government have been searching for compromises and, in trying to satisfy everybody, have satisfied nobody except those who want the mega-casinos.

Kate Hoey: I share my hon. Friend's concern about the vote. Does he agree that, given the all-round support for many aspects of the Bill, the Government could solve the difficulty by withdrawing the provision on the mega-casinos, thus allowing the regulation provisions to have all-party support and progress through the House quickly?

Mr. Griffiths: That is a brilliant idea, which I would happily support. If the Government said that they had decided to do that in fairness to the views expressed, I would be happy. Pigs may fly and I am waiting. However, at the moment I am veering towards voting against Second Reading. Earlier, I thought that I would vote to allow it to proceed to Committee, but the possibility of genuinely significant change appears to diminish as the night goes on.

7.29 pm

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): It gives me great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths). I agree with his views and he amply articulated the reasons why Her Majesty's Opposition will vote against Second Reading. They will do that for many of the reasons that he outlined.

I am delighted to be called to speak because the Bill heralds one of the most profound social changes in our society that I have witnessed in my seven years as a Member of Parliament. I am therefore pleased to put my arguments on the record and I shall be equally pleased, if I am chosen, to serve in Committee.

Many Members, including the Secretary of State, have given personal freedom to gamble as a good reason for the Bill. In fact, the United Kingdom already has liberal, adult, fair and reasonable gaming laws that have stood the test of time, as is shown by the fact that, in relative terms, we have fewer gambling addicts than other jurisdictions. It is possible to win many millions of pounds on the lottery. It is possible to put any amount on a horse at a bookmaker's and—in the case of those lucky enough to pick all the right horses—to win many hundreds of thousands of pounds. There are plenty of opportunities to gamble, and that includes casinos, of which there are already 130. I see no overwhelming reason to change the gambling laws more profoundly than they have been changed already, and my view is strongly supported by the results of public opinion polls.

Many Members, including the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) and my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir Brian Mawhinney), have suggested that we can all agree with 90 per cent. of the Bill. I hope the Minister listens, because much of what he wishes to do is very relevant. The Bill could have a fair passage through both Houses if he chose to proceed with that 90 per cent. rather than the 10 per cent. that relates to the casino industry. I fear that he will not listen tonight, but given the House's expectation of a general election next year and a possible clearing of the decks by March, when the shutters come down the 90 per cent. may well go through on the nod and the 10 per cent. may well be dropped. It is a shame that so much engagement must take place on measures that I think are unlikely to be passed.

Mr. Hoyle rose—

Miss Kirkbride: Does my hon. Friend wish to intervene?

Mr. Hoyle: The hon. Lady's hon. Friend is very pleased that she has given way. She is opposed to 10 per cent. of the Bill, but—although this relates to that 10 per cent.—may I ask whether she would accept one or two super-casinos on a trial basis?

Miss Kirkbride: I am happy to pre-empt my speech. I would prefer one super-casino on a trial basis, although I would probably accept two. I would like to take the argument further, but I am happy to give a direct answer to a direct question.

Let me now focus on my disagreements with the Government. The main one relates to their argument that their principal aim is to protect children. I do not think that it stacks up. At Question Time, the Secretary of State failed to answer my question about how the Bill would benefit children. In fact, the Department has done no research that shows what harm is done to them by the existing gaming laws. I see no reason to prevent fish and chip shops and cab firms from retaining their modest slot machines offering a £5 payout for a 10p stake. Local authorities already have the right to ban machines from such premises, but they do not choose to do so. Why are the Government choosing to do it now? This seems a vindictive measure, given that it will affect small businesses that work hard to make a profit.

The Government claim that they want to regulate the internet in order to protect children, but as they cannot regulate internet sites outside the UK's jurisdiction, there is no real argument for that either.

I am particularly worried about the possible effect on seaside slot machine arcades. Many seaside communities already face serious economic challenges, and such arcades do no obvious harm to children. I remember gambling in them as a child—and I assure the Minister that I am not a gambler now by any stretch of the imagination. We are talking about a harmless pursuit that promotes economic activity in seaside resorts. The Minister denies that there would be a problem, but there is a problem: his intention to put a black spot on seaside arcades by creating a power that could shut them down overnight. Any seaside arcade owner thinking of investing in gaming machines will be deeply worried, not just by that part of the Bill, but by measures to cut the stake to be levied and the value of the potential prize. I hope very much that the Minister will think again.

Kate Hoey rose—

Miss Kirkbride: I will happily give way to my hon. Friend—as she is, on this issue.

Kate Hoey: Given her former responsibility, does the hon. Lady share my concern about the many sports clubs throughout the country that use gaming machines as a direct means of raising income? They are licensed to have the machines, but do not allow children under 18 to use them. Will not the Government have to find a way to replace the money that many small amateur sports clubs will lose?

Miss Kirkbride: That is a good point. Last year, the Government rightly gave sports clubs of that kind rate relief, but depriving them of the machines could do more damage than depriving them of the relief.

Members have mentioned the changes relating to category A gaming machines. My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page), who has left the Chamber, said he did not see how the new regime would make a difference, but it would produce an environment very different from the one to which we are accustomed. Category A machines are programmed by very clever people to be enticing, hypnotic and addictive. The player feels that he is one point, or one fruit, away from the £1 million prize: he need only chase his losses, and everything will be all right on the night. That is very different from gambling on the horses, because the bookmakers close. It is very different from gambling on the lottery, which can be done only twice a week. These premises will be open 24 hours a day and can be visited by people on their way to work and on their way back. Even on the Government's estimate, they will be available in up to 40 towns and cities.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) said that he thought casinos should be available in every region, and what was the problem? The problem is this: people who are addicted to gambling will be able to play addictive slot machines every hour of the day, every day of the week, every week of the year. Again, that is very different from what we have been used to.

The hon. Gentleman gave an interesting response to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) about the number of casinos already in Glasgow. I was surprised to learn that Glasgow already supports six casinos and that planning is under way for five super-casinos. The Government's proposals will do great damage to existing casinos because as they are not allowed to operate category A machines, they will be wiped out by the new regime—not that I am suggesting that they should be allowed category A machines.

There is clearly an incipient demand for casinos of this kind, especially in poorer communities, and the idea that no great social change will ensue from the Government's proposals is strictly for the birds. With 40 super-casinos across the country, the bulk of the population will have regular access to such gaming. I think that that will herald serious social changes. It will also displace many existing businesses. It will damage pubs, clubs and restaurants in town centres. In order to recoup investment in casinos they will have to drag the punters in by offering cheap booze and meals and free entertainment. Those who do not gamble will have a very nice time, but those who do will be in deep trouble. Their names and addresses will be taken down, and when they have not been there for a week they will be reminded that if they go in they can have £10-worth on the slot machine free—and hey presto, they will end up spending much more than they expected to. I do not think that people appreciate just how such organisations work and it will come as quite a shock as and when the proposals are unleashed.

Money laundering has not been referred to in the debate to my knowledge since it was mentioned by the Secretary of State. It is shocking that the Government are even considering changing the money laundering regulations in order to allow people to take away their chips. If any hon. Member goes to the bank, we have to take our birth certificate and everything else to prove that we exist just to put £5 into an account, yet we will be able to take away thousands of pounds worth of chips with no questions asked. It is quite wrong, but clearly it is the only way that the big American casino operators will be persuaded to come to Britain. It is disgraceful that that should even be considered.

The quintessence of new Labour's confusion is that it can on the one hand say that these are great proposals, using all the buzz words such as regeneration, modernisation, that it will all be fantastic and that the casino operators will come and spend hundreds of millions of pounds tarting up our seaside resorts and town centres, but make no mention of those who will provide the return on that investment. Who will provide the returns on the investments made by the casino operators in our town centres? It will be those who can least afford it, the people who think that their lives can be changed by a big win on the category A machines, and it has to be a lot of people if tens or hundreds of millions of pounds of investment is to be recouped.

To answer again the point made by the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle), I very much favour the early-day motion tabled by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) suggesting that we should trial one of these resort destination category A casinos in one place—I would be more than happy for it to be Blackpool, which has made a good case for itself—and I hope that my words and those of other hon. Members will be listened to tonight.

Mr. Tony Banks (West Ham) (Lab): I assure the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) that a large category A win on a machine would certainly change my way of life, and I do not share the nightmare scenario that she has just described. I certainly do not know where she heard some of these wilder accusations about deals being done with the US casino industry by the Government. As an ex-journalist, her imagination is fertile, as are those of so many of her erstwhile colleagues.

I declare my interests in this issue. I sat on the pre-legislative scrutiny Joint Committee and I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) who chaired it with skill and great fairness. I have also recently completed an Industry and Parliament Trust fellowship at Ladbrokes. I hasten to add that my only financial involvement with Ladbrokes is that of a small albeit consistent contributor to its profit margins through my eternally optimistic betting on Chelsea winning 10-nil each week. One day it will come up and I will clear up as well. I might not have learnt how to beat the odds while I was at Ladbrokes, but I did come to appreciate how efficient, profitable and socially responsible a business Ladbrokes is, and I am certain that those attributes are also shared by other bookmakers such as William Hill and Paddy Power.

While at Ladbrokes, I was afforded access at all levels, from boardroom through to betting shop, and I was left with the clear impression that the British gambling industry is one of the best regulated, and most orderly and efficient in the world. For those who have a moral objection to gambling, such virtues will be of no consolation, but gambling remains a leisure activity for the vast majority of those who participate, and it is essential that they should have confidence in the industry's probity. One of the main attractions of the British gambling industry for those at home and overseas is that it is overwhelmingly free of corruption and is not controlled by criminal interests. I wholeheartedly support the Bill because I believe that it will reinforce such a well-merited reputation.

The reaction to the Bill, especially in the media, has bordered on the grotesque. I will always respect those with a moral track record against gambling, but spare me the anti-Government moralising of the Daily Mail. If the Prime Minister was declared to be the son of God, and there are some Labour Members who believe that he is, the Daily Mail would undoubtedly be whipping up support for the devil. On gambling, as on many other social issues, I am a libertarian. Providing an individual's activities do not imperil, attack or destroy the lives and interests of other individuals or species—or species—Government involvement should be minimal.

Life is not of course simple and straightforward, and there will always be those who take any activity to excess, whether it is gambling, drinking, smoking, eating, shopping, or, indeed, sex. Such people need help, but I assume that we would not seriously consider banning the activities in order to protect the obsessive minority to the detriment of the responsible majority. In such situations, the Government's job is to offer advice and information to enable people to make informed choices, and where necessary the Government should regulate. That is precisely what the Bill sets out to do.

I particularly welcome those parts of the Bill that seek to update casino rules that are both silly and patronising. The 24-hour membership rule is the most obvious example, but membership of a casino should be retained and that can be considered in Committee. I know that the British Casino Association would support that. However, if the Bill is defeated on Second Reading and there is no Committee stage, many of the good points made tonight cannot possibly be addressed.

I find it strange that in London, for example, only certain boroughs, such as Westminster, Camden and Kensington, are allowed to have casinos. I personally would like to see a casino in the east end as part of leisure and recreational facilities. Indeed, in 1990 when I proposed in the House the idea of a directly elected mayor for London, which I believe was not universally welcomed at the time, I also proposed that part of the resources available to the mayor should derive from gambling profits in London. I recommended then, 14 years ago, the liberalisation of gaming laws to allow the setting up of municipally owned casinos in London and elsewhere, operated by others maybe and under licence, particularly riverboat casinos on the Thames, which would add to the attraction of the city. It is right that the city should be able to benefit from such things.

I might add that one of the things that we should be doing instead of just granting licences is auctioning them, because one way of testing the market is by seeing how much people are prepared to pay. I saw, indeed see, no reason why local authorities should not derive substantial income and benefits from casino and other forms of gambling, and that is why I support the Bill.

Much of the opposition to casinos, which we have spent much time discussing, has centred on their possible proliferation and the likelihood that this part of the industry will be dominated by American big business. The first objection is addressed by the Government's assurances with regard to regional local authority determination, although there is good support on both sides of the House for a planning strategy for casinos, and that too should be considered closely in Committee.

The idea that the American industry will take over the whole of the British casino and gambling industry is alarmist. I have been reading newspaper stories about £100 million being lavished by US gambling interests on lobbying in this country, but I think that that is sheer fantasy and I can find no evidence of that whatever, and no one has put forward any evidence that that sort of sum has been spent, but it somehow fits in well with the semi-demented accusation by the Daily Mail that the Government are "sacrificing the most weak and vulnerable to the high priests of gambling".

Such purple prose is rarely written before lunchtime.

It might well be that the highly developed US casino industry will wish to invest heavily in the UK, but before it does, the Government should insist on a quid pro quo. At the moment, bookmakers in this country cannot accept sports wagers from US residents, either online or by telephone, nor do they accept casino, poker or other kinds of gaming. The federal legislation, the Wire Act, explicitly prohibits sports betting and, it is claimed, internet casino wagering as well.

As we know, internet gambling is the fastest growing unregulated part of the British gaming industry, and it seems right that we should regulate it, but we should also try to persuade the United States to bring its gambling laws up to date. It is wrong that the Americans should have the right to refuse a business operation based in London, Gibraltar or elsewhere, and we should push them hard on that. If they are to have access to our gambling industry, we should insist that they bring their laws in line with ours. Officially, one cannot bet online or on sports fixtures in the US, but anyone in any bar in New York knows that in fact one can. The American gambling regime is much like ours before 1961.

Under controlled and well-regulated conditions, gambling on football, racing and the lottery, and over the internet and in casinos, can be both harmless and fun. The Government should press ahead with the Bill, and I hope that my hon. Friends will not join the Opposition parties in voting against Second Reading, because if the Bill does not go into Committee, we cannot improve it. It will no doubt emerge improved, and in a few years' time people will wonder what all the fuss was about. I would certainly put money on that.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): The debate so far has been fascinating. The best speeches have come from the Back Benches. In particular, the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) was fluent and moving on the problem of gambling, and the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) made a remarkably honest speech and seemed to be moving in the right direction. My hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride), who knows a lot about this, was also extremely good, and even the hon. Member for West Ham (Mr. Banks), who usually tries to whip us up, tried to calm us down and said some very interesting things.

For myself, I am wholly opposed to the Bill. It is a bad Bill that promotes gambling, and it should be scrapped. The mood of the House has been clear, and even those who have supported the Bill in broad terms have said that there is quite a lot wrong with it. The hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) offered the most sensible compromise solution when she said that all the stuff relating to casinos should be scrapped and the rest kept. I might be prepared to go along with that, but the fact remains that this is a very bad Bill.

The Government's strongest argument is that the status quo is indefensible, and they have attempted to portray all those who seek to defend it as fantasists. Frankly, there is not much wrong with the status quo. For the past 40 years or so, gambling has been well regulated and we have had fewer gambling addicts than in other countries. The situation is reasonably under control and people can enjoy themselves without going to the extremes seen in countries such as America and Australia. Of course, the status quo gets out of date from time to time, and I understand that internet gambling must be controlled, but why not have a Bill devoted to that subject alone? Let us deal with it head on. There is no need to change radically the whole basis of gambling regulation.

The situation in this country is fundamentally satisfactory, and with occasional tinkering—perhaps quite major tinkering from time to time—we can avoid throwing out the baby with the bathwater and keep what is good about the current set-up. Other countries are envious of what we have achieved: a balance between the liberal approach of allowing people to gamble if they want to and avoiding the damaging consequences that have become obvious in many other countries.

The Bill will inevitably lead to a proliferation of super-casinos. Let us not forget where all this started: the mob wanted somewhere to launder their money, so Bugsy Siegel and Meyer Lansky founded the casinos that are the forefathers of today's. Then America took it a step further and casinos were built in depressed places such as Atlantic City in the recession of the 1980s. I have full sympathy with the seaside resorts argument, and there is undoubtedly a problem in places such as Blackpool, but let us deal with that specifically—there is no need to change the whole scenario. Again, the Americans set up casinos on Indian reservations to help their depressed economies, and we have seen the consequences of such ideas in Australia as well.

When the Government are told of the appalling growth of gambling addiction in Australia, they say, "Oh well, it would be different here." Frankly, I doubt it. Whatever regulation we have, I bet the inevitable market forces will break through and make maximum use of any gaps left in the legislation. I am the realist on this, not the Government. If they think that they can staunch the problem by regulation, they are living in cloud cuckoo land. The weight of demand will burst through.

The Bill will inevitably lead to more crime. It was said in one newspaper—I do not think it was the Daily Mail—that in Atlantic City casinos equal crime, and crime equals casinos. It is a natural relationship because of money laundering, and drugs and prostitution follow. Atlantic City is a perfect example of what could happen in this country in areas around the casinos.

As the hon. Member for Ceredigion said, it is not a light matter that there are 300,000 gambling addicts in the country, and that number will inevitably be added to, despite what the Secretary of State says, by a growth in gambling. It is a great tragedy.

I agree with those who have spoken about poverty. The fact is that the poor will suffer most from these measures, and it is a great pity. It is not patronising to say so—it is facing facts.

There is clearly some truth in the regeneration argument, but at what cost? I suspect that casinos will be like the banyan tree: they will flourish at the expense of all around them. That is certainly true in Atlantic City, where there are 43-storey casinos surrounded by a wasteland of sleazy bars and so forth. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor) pointed out how many hotels and restaurants had closed as a consequence of such development. It may look like regeneration, but it is not really. The idea that we have to rely on gambling to regenerate our inner cities is bankrupt. Surely we can do better.

I am surprised that it is the Labour party that has introduced this idea—a party that owes more to Methodism than to Marx and once prided itself on its moral standpoint; a party once led by John Smith. Would John Smith have introduced such a Bill? I very much doubt it. This is the Government who introduced 24-hour drinking. What sort of society are they creating? This is the party that sneered at the encouragement of private enterprise when the Tories were in power, and they have now gone to the trashiest and commercial end of the unacceptable face of capitalism. That shows the real moral vacuum of new Labour, which just does not know where it stands.

The Government and the Secretary of State have mishandled the Bill. All the evidence of the shenanigans of the past few days shows that she went too far in the direction of what the American and British companies wanted and had to pull back under pressure from the House and from public opinion. I applaud her willingness to pull back and to be flexible, but she was forced into it. I do not blame her alone: the Cabinet had some responsibility. They should have put their foot down and said that this would not wash.

Mr. Simon Thomas: We do not have Cabinet Government any more.

Mr. Horam: I quite agree. Under Conservative Governments, we had a Willie Whitelaw factor—someone who said, "No, I don't think this will wash." Perhaps Labour now needs a Frank Dobson factor, with someone saying, "Look, this is not what the Labour party is about." I am very surprised that old or new Labour can support such a Bill. The Government should think again, scrap this Bill and introduce a new one to do the sensible things that are a part of it.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): The fact that the country's gambling laws need to be tidied up and brought up to date is not in dispute. Most Members will also welcome the proposal to consolidate into a single Act of Parliament all the legislation relating to the various categories of gambling. I am equally confident that the formation of a gambling commission to license operators and key personnel working in the gaming industry with significant powers to regulate, supervise and enforce high standards of conduct and social responsibility throughout the industry will be welcomed. The measure of democratic control given to local authorities by conferring on them responsibility for licensing gaming premises also has the broad support of Members of Parliament and of much of the gaming industry and the public at large.

Having said all that, I believe that that is where consensus on the Bill in its present form comes to an end. The Bill's publication has triggered an outcry from Church and religious groups as well as charitable institutions and welfare organisations. It has caused anger and resentment in many parts of the leisure and gaming industry, and it has caused great alarm in the minds of many Members and among the public.

The issue of greatest concern to us all is problem gambling. The British gambling prevalence survey suggested that we have somewhere between 275,000 and 370,000 problem gamblers. Gambling addicts, like those who suffer from alcohol and drug addictions, are usually in denial of the problem. Those who accept that a problem exists are keen to hide it. It is not unreasonable to assume, therefore, that the official estimate of the number of problem gamblers significantly understates the problem. Even if we accept the official estimates, taking the mid-range figure of one third of a million problem gamblers, most of those people will have parents, spouses, partners and children, and it is perfectly reasonable to assume that in excess of 1 million of our citizens' lives have already been blighted by problem gambling.

The Budd report highlighted many, but by no means all, the potential negative consequences of problem gambling, including financial hardship, debt, exposure to loan sharks, bankruptcy, resorting to theft, imprisonment, neglect of family, the breakdown of relationships, domestic and other violence, poor health, absenteeism, stress, depression, anxiety, suicide, burdens on charities and burdens on the public purse. We can all imagine the psychological scars left on the children of families whose lives are shattered as a result of a parent's gambling addiction.

It seems to me that a top priority for the Bill should be the introduction of measures aimed at reducing the incidence of problem gambling and procedures designed to mitigate the effects of gambling. We must ensure that the Bill's passage does not exacerbate the situation by bringing about a significant increase in problem gambling.

The Bill starts well enough. The measures to establish a commission and protect young people and children, as well as the promise of a gambling prevalence study every two to three years, show a commitment by the Government to tackle problem gambling. However, the lack of detail on what is to be done and how the Bill will be applied makes an objective assessment of those measures' effectiveness impossible. If the Bill were simply about establishing a gambling commission to oversee and regulate all aspects of gambling in Britain and to introduce measures to tackle problem gambling, protect children and transfer the licensing of premises from magistrates to local authorities, I would, even given the lack of detail, be more than happy to support it.

Of course, the Bill does much more than that. It removes a number of regulatory measures, which will allow a significant expansion of gaming in Britain. The only limits to expansion appear to be market demand and local authority resistance. On one hand, we are considering a series of non-specific measures designed to tackle problem gambling, while, on the other, we are considering removing existing regulations to allow an unknown, but probably sizeable, increase in gambling. That will undoubtedly lead to a significant increase in problem gambling. To allow a virtually uncontrolled expansion of gambling without having put in place and tested the protective measures that the gambling commission may introduce is, frankly, a recipe for disaster. I could not support that.

Surely a far more sensible approach, as many hon. Members have said, would be to allow a limited number of pilot projects in designated areas and to evaluate their impact on gambling behaviour. That would present an opportunity to identify and address any problems that arose before the Bill's full provisions were introduced throughout Britain.

It is self-evident that just as alcoholics do not become alcoholics by choice or overnight, but do so through repeated heavy drinking, so gambling addicts become that way because of repeated participation in gambling activities. It logically follows that increased participation in gambling among the population will involve a proportionate number of people who have the social, psychological and emotional characteristics that make them vulnerable to gambling addiction.

I shall make a couple of observations about the Government's proposals for casinos. The first relates to the decision to allow alcoholic drinks to be served at gaming tables. I am very uneasy about the wisdom of that decision for two reasons. First, casinos tend to have a highly charged atmosphere, in which it is easy to get carried away. Consuming alcohol while gambling is fraught with danger, and it should not be encouraged. Secondly, having to leave the gambling area to have a drink provides an opportunity for punters to chill out and take stock of their situation. I ask the Minister to give further thought to that.

The other issue that I wish to raise regarding casinos has caused much anger and concern in the gaming industry. It is the arbitrary and prescriptive way in which casinos have been classified. I am unable to detect any logical, moral or commercial imperative that led the Government to draw up their plans for casinos. I believe that those plans should be removed from the Bill and that the gambling commission, local authorities and the industry should be allowed to develop a limited number of pilot projects that meet the needs of the area in which they operate as well as those of the operators. They should be able to support the objectives of the gambling commission as stated in the Bill.

Finally, I raised earlier this afternoon an issue that concerns me as the Member of Parliament for a seaside town and which causes similar concern to businesses that have amusement arcades in Morecambe and BACTA, which represents them. Clause 56 states:

> "The Secretary of State may by order create an offence of inviting, causing or permitting a child or young person below a specified age to use a Category D gaming machine."

I must ask once more, because I do not think I had a sufficient answer earlier, whether the Government are really contemplating bringing in a law under which a parent could be prosecuted for allowing a child to roll a 10 pence piece down a chute or operate a crane in an attempt to win a small cuddly toy. If they do not intend to do that, why can they not remove clause 56? For what reason should it remain if it is not to be implemented?

I hope that the Government will work with BACTA—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Lady has had her 10 minutes.

8.10 pm

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith) on her speech. I wish to be equally frank and put my cards on the table.

I do not believe that legislating to allow the proliferation of gambling is in the interests of individuals, communities or the country. Gambling is a particularly pernicious activity when it affects poorer members of society who cannot afford to lose, but who will always do so. The problems with the Bill are synonymous with the problems with gambling itself: it gives a little, but takes far more back and on an ever-increasing scale. The result? Only the Treasury in the short term and the casino companies in the long term are winners.

The only value in the Bill is the attempt to modernise and streamline gambling laws that have been unreformed for 40 years. I welcome the establishment of a more powerful gambling commission and the extension of the legislation to cover internet gambling, although the proposals duck the worldwide nature of internet gaming. However, I fear that any winnings that could be reaped from such reforms will not be banked but lost, as deregulation permits a rash of super-casinos to be created across Britain, making the inclusion of measures to protect children appear no more than a sop to our conscience.

The Prime Minister has estimated, we are told, that in the absence of a statutory limit the Bill will lead to between 20 and 40 new super-casinos with 24-hour access and unlimited jackpots. The Government have rejected the Joint Committee's proposals for higher minimum casino sizes and non-gambling facilities, even though those proposals would limit the number of casinos and where they could be. The Bill would leave casino corporations free to use section 106-type agreements to seduce cash-strapped local authorities and pave the way for what I would call a plague of casinos throughout the country, despite the Prime Minister's reassurances.

Increased ease of access to gambling is the key problem. People will be able to gamble day or night across the country immediately they choose to do so. Prior to the Bill, the 48-hour, then 24-hour, cool-off period during which new members could not use casino facilities was deliberate. It ensured that the decision to gamble was a considered choice. The removal of that safeguard will allow people to act immediately, lured by the false promise of financial gratification or acting on impulse.

Previous legislation was also based on the premise that gambling facilities would be sufficient to meet the unstimulated demand for them. In contrast to that, the Bill will sanction the development of casinos across the country, and that increased supply will in itself stimulate demand. That is a complete reversal of what went before.

The Budd report recognised the link between deregulation of gambling laws and an increase in problem gambling. That connection has been well proven in Australia, where deregulation of the gambling industry, and in particular, the increased immediacy of access through slot machines at casino entrances has become a major cause of poverty. The cost to the community in Australia is 5.6 billion Australian dollars, on top of the 1 billion Australian dollars already staked and lost. The logic is indisputable. If something is more widely available, it is more easily available to people who risk becoming involved beyond their means. One does not need to be a bookmaker to realise that that is not a very good bet for this country.

Problem gambling is defined as

> "gambling to a degree that compromises, disrupts or damages family, personal or recreational pursuits", and it affects some 350,000 individuals and their families across Britain. It would be splitting hairs to try to distinguish between problem gamblers and people with problems who gamble. The net effect is the same. Gambling addiction is best considered as a continuum—a slippery slope made more greasy as more opportunities to gamble exist. Ease and speed of access is provided and the pernicious promise of unearned, instant gratification is promoted.

I am not an absolutist. I recognise that there is a considerable difference between a weekly £2 flutter on the football pools and gambling in casinos or online. However, the general principle remains. Gambling does not do individuals any good, nor is it to the common good. It does not increase the wealth of the nation, but sucks in and makes more destitute the poorest in our society, leaving them with nothing except the desire to try their luck again.

Although I accepted the national lottery with some reluctance—we were told that otherwise we would be invaded by foreign lotteries—I continue to oppose, as I did then, scratch cards. The market at which they are aimed is nearly always those who can least afford them.

Responsible opposition to the deregulation of the gambling industry should not be derided, as it has been, as an illiberal extension of the nanny state or snobbery. However, the fact that such initiatives are coming from the Department for Culture, Media and Sport raises the question: what type of culture the Government are trying to promote? Do we really want a culture that penalises saving and actively encourages the waste of gambling? My motivation for opposing the Bill is not puritanical but utilitarian. Any Government have a duty to reduce the harm that individuals can do to themselves and their families rather than to facilitate it.

Why are the Government therefore legislating to deregulate casinos? We know that the promised regeneration that doing so may bring will not be cost-free, and will be undermined by the accompanying social degeneration. We know that 93 per cent. of the population are against the Bill and that the vast majority opposed casinos opening in their neighbourhood. In this instance one can acquit the Government of trying to be populist.

The Bill, particularly the provisions on casinos, seems to be driven by a financial consideration, whether as an objective or a welcome side effect. Her Majesty's Customs and Excise collected £1,530 million in gambling duty between 1998 and 1999—22 per cent. of the gross gain in yield. It is estimated that by 2010 deregulation of gambling will have delivered at least £400 million a year more in taxes.

Tax revenues from gambling, combined with the regenerative measures that casino companies will have to implement in exchange for planning permission mean that the Government's pockets will be lined by the deregulation. I can see no other reason for that relaxation in gambling. However, in years to come, the inevitable damaging impact of gambling will have to be dealt with and paid for. If the Bill becomes law, expensive initiatives will have to be developed and financed to combat the effects of gambling on individuals and society.

The financial myopia of the Bill, and a desire for taxation by stealth, typifies the Government's entire strategy. They give with one hand, then take back far more with the other, while ignoring the harmful side effects. I hope that the House will reject this damaging, short-sighted and blinkered proposal, which would do some good, but would do a great deal of harm as well.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): I salute the Secretary of State for being here today, given the sadness that she has been through recently, and for the example that she sets to others on the Treasury Bench. In her opening speech she said that she was prepared to listen, although the normal procedure is that when Secretaries of State have finished speaking and the Opposition start, they do not appear again until the winding-up speeches.

Having listened to the debate, my right hon. Friend will know that there have been two themes that have knitted together almost every contribution to it. The first theme has been that there is no contention but that most of the Bill is needed to bring up to date the legal framework within which gambling operates in this country. Equally, there has been a concern about the possible or likely side effects of licensing mega-casinos, and I wish very briefly to develop three themes that bear on the consequences of those mega-casinos.

It is significant that, in the arguments that the Government have used in defending the existence of that part of the Bill, they have not been playing the ball; they have been kicking the players. A number of allegations have been made against those who may oppose the introduction of mega-casinos in this country. It has been suggested that we might be against gambling. The record shows that I have supported every gambling Bill that the Government have introduced since I have been a Member of Parliament.

It is also said that there is more than a whiff of anti-Americanism about those who oppose the casino proposals. When the Government are really under pressure on the Iraq war, they sometimes give the nod to the Lobby that I am prepared to go out and defend them. I willingly do so; I am proud of the special relationship that we have with America. I am just so sad that it is not strong enough for us to convince our American colleagues that there is a difference between policing and bombing. I speak as somebody who is very pro-American and who knows that Europe is free because of the lives that Americans gave, so there is no hint of anti-Americanism in what I have to say.

Neither am I part of that lobby—it has had some recent conversions, thank God—that believes that people should not spend their own money. I cite just one example. Back in 1975, which I know is before many of my hon. Friends were born, I tried to persuade our party that our policy should be to sell council houses and use the revenue to build new stock. I was told that our supporters were not capable of managing their own homes. I find it just slightly galling that some of the people who say I am being patronising in opposing the new super-casinos opposed the sale of council houses in those early days in the belief that our supporters were not up to spending their own money and running their own lives.

So none of those arguments holds as far as I am concerned, but the Welsh nationalists put a very serious argument earlier. What does it tell us about the Government's regeneration schemes if we now have to depend on mega-casinos to reach those parts of our poorest areas that none of our other regeneration policies has touched? I use the phrasing from a lager advert, which shows that I am a drinker as well. We have to accept the argument that the Welsh nationalists put in saying that, despite all the initiatives that the Government have taken to try to bring some of our poorest areas towards the level of the average areas of our society, let alone the richest ones, we have not succeeded as we had hoped.

There is therefore an attraction for me in the Government's argument that we should think of mega-casinos as an agent of regeneration, but I do not believe that they can hold that line unless they are prepared to concede a cap on the number of casinos. If we have more than one casino in the north-west, no casino will be situated in Blackpool, despite the eloquence of my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble). They will go to Manchester, Liverpool or some of the other richer places. Indeed, if more than one licence were granted, and one casino went to Blackpool and another went to Manchester, the Secretary of State would need all the resources that the armed forces have in this country to drive people up the motorway away from the Manchester casino and into Blackpool. Regeneration will not take place in the areas for which she is holding out hope in the Bill unless she is prepared to limit severely the numbers of super-casinos for the whole country, and I believe that she should limit them to one per region. I know that some of my hon. Friends will think that I am weak in thinking that we might have six or so pilots around the country, but I believe that experiments should be tried in each of our regions.

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend consider another measure to which the Secretary of State—I say this while she is in her place—might like to like to give some thought? If the Government are serious about ensuring that the super-casinos can happen only with the will of the local communities and authorities, they should write into the Bill in Committee the ability for local authorities solely to determine any planning application and not allow the casino operators the right to go to appeal. We all know what happens when giant corporations can, in many ways, hold local councils to ransom over the planning appeal process.

Mr. Field: We know precisely that, but I intervened on the Secretary of State earlier because of my fear that, under the European convention on human rights, she will not be able to hold the position of not allowing appeals. Although the Government will have a lesson dealt out to them by the referendum in the north-east—I think that we will get the result this week—I believe that the only way of guaranteeing that local people will have a say will be to give them a vote on this matter in a referendum. Even in the European Court, there would not have to be an appeal if the people themselves so decided.

If we are serious about using the Bill as another agent of regeneration where all our other policies have failed, we cannot have more than one casino per region. Otherwise, the casinos will not go to the poorest areas; they will naturally go to those that are most attractive. [Interruption.] I shall speak very slowly so as to use the whole of the nine minutes and 43 seconds that I now apparently have. I had wanted to come within the target.

My last point is about whether we should vote against the Bill on Second Reading. We heard a most helpful intervention from the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), who specialises in strengthening his own Front Bench, but I fear that his skills have beguiled some of my colleagues. The thought is that we are involved only in high politics, but our concern on Second Reading is on the principle. As to the thought that we might vote against the Government to try to influence them and risk the Bill, that is precisely what I ask my hon. Friends to do this evening. We have never defeated the Government. They know that, if they have a tough time on Second Reading, a number of us are prepared to vote against them in the Lobby and many more are prepared to abstain, and their hand will be weakened on Report. If my hon. Friends seriously believe they will get concessions from the Government severely limiting the number of super-casinos, the lessons of this Parliament teach them that they would not have got concessions on top-up fees or foundation hospitals. They may consider it a matter of principle that we vote for Second Reading, but we can argue with the Government and deal with the matter on Report.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I have listened carefully to my right hon. Friend and agree with some of the points that he is making, but will he explain to me what principle would be served by throwing the Bill out tonight, together with all the good things in it, on which hon. Members from all parts of the House agree—the protection of children from internet betting and other issues that the public would support? What kind of principled stance would it be to throw all that out?

Mr. Field: We will never throw the Bill out. We have never been able to throw out a Government Bill on Second Reading, but the more of us who tell the Government that we are unhappy with their proposal and that we will vote against it or abstain, the more power we will have on Report. Of course the whole House wants, say, 90 per cent. of the Bill. Should there be a major uprising and should the Government be defeated, we know perfectly well that they would announce from the Dispatch Box that they would introduce that 90 per cent. tomorrow in a separate Bill. They will not be defeated. That is not the issue. We do not wish to defeat the Government. What we need is a large vote against and an even bigger abstention, so that when we come to the Report stage the Government hand is so weakened that our wish will carry the day.

8.30 pm

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and to agree with many of the points that he made. However, the award for the most profound and impressive speech tonight should go to the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who captured the mood of the nation in his opposition to the Bill. The Labour Front-Bench team do not know quite what they are doing by introducing a measure that engenders so much deep opposition among so many of our communities throughout the land.

I made my decision several weeks ago that, whatever my party said on the Bill, I would vote against it. I did not reach that decision lightly but I made it because I so profoundly disagree with the contents of the Bill and its potential impact, particularly on vulnerable people. I am extremely concerned that if the Bill becomes law, as I hope it does not in its current form, one of the obvious and almost immediate consequences will be a significant increase in the number of people who suffer from gambling debts and gambling addiction. I certainly did not come into this place to make life more miserable for our constituents.

There is something about the Bill that takes the country in the wrong direction. I do not want to major on that tonight, but in addition to our many existing social problems, the impact of the Bill is not what we need. Following the right hon. Member for Birkenhead in his advice to colleagues on how we should go forward, I used to be in the Whips Office when we were in government and I know a little about how these things work. Colleagues who believe that we can vote for the measure tonight and that the Government will make major concessions in Committee, with the inbuilt majority that they will have on that Committee and with colleagues who are surprisingly placed to serve on the Committee for very particular reasons, are living in cloud cuckoo land. I strongly urge all hon. Members to follow the leadership of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead and vote down the measure.

Of course we want some of the better aspects of the Bill. I want them too, but, as has been said, they can be brought back very quickly either tomorrow or in the Queen's Speech and, with all parties supporting them, they can make speedy progress through the House and become law within the same time scale as is currently envisaged. Those who have profound reservations, as I do, about the impact of the Bill on vulnerable people have only one course of action open to them tonight: not to support the Bill, and to vote against it.

I would support some kind of pilot scheme, whether in Blackpool or Great Yarmouth. Both places have massive attractions. Something that has never been tried in this country before should be tested, and there should be a pilot. I would not object to that, but what the Government are proposing is wrong.

Like most of my hon. Friends, freedom and individual choice are my starting point in approaching a subject of this nature. We must also recognise that many people out there suffer disproportionately from the impacts of some of those choices. In respect of smoking, drinking alcohol, drug taking, access to credit and gambling we already restrict people's choices. We have laws about drugs, tobacco advertising, alcohol sales and gambling because of the individual and social consequences that would flow from a free-for-all. I make no apologies to those from the libertarian camp when I suggest that by continuing to restrict gambling, we are becoming or continuing to be a nanny state. We start from freedom and individual choice, but that is not the end of the matter. There must be protection. Freedom must be tempered with responsibility and order.

It has been said that our current gambling regime is one of the tightest in the developed world. We also know that we have one of the smallest proportions of people with a gambling addiction and gambling debt. Those two facts are not unrelated and we disconnect them at our peril. If we were to vote the Bill into law, we would see a significant increase in gambling debt and addiction.

I am not against gambling as a whole. I am not a great supporter of it, but I have the occasional flutter on the lottery or the Grand National. As far as I recall, I have never won anything. I am not in one of the Secretary of State's categorisations of people who are against gambling on principle. However, I am not in favour of the explosion of gambling that the Bill represents.

As we have heard, up to 400,000 people have a problem with gambling and that means that many other people suffer within the circles of their families. Proposals to introduce super-casinos in accessible places—whether 20, 30, 40 or even more—and unlimited-prize machines, and to remove the 24-hour cooling-off period, are bound to increase the number of people who gamble and, therefore, the number of people who fall into gambling addictions.

Whether we like it or not, gambling disproportionately affects those with the least disposable incomes. Recent research has shown that more than three times as many problems arise for gamblers in households where there is an income of less than £15,000 compared with those in households with an income of £32,000 or more. This July, personal debt in the United Kingdom topped £1 trillion for the first time. Citizens Advice tells us that it has seen a 44 per cent. increase in the number of people seeking help with debt problems over the past six years. Average household debt, excluding mortgages, is now £7,000 per household. Problems of personal debt are becoming worse by the day and the Bill would only add to the numbers of those who become mired in gambling debt and fall into unsustainability.

Why would that happen if we passed the Bill? Experience in this country and elsewhere shows that, if we make it easier for people to do something, more of them will do it, even though that might harm them and their families. If the Bill becomes law, it will make it easier for people to drop into a super-casino that is placed in a highly accessible location, either in the high street or out of town. Is it fanciful to imagine that new super-casinos might be placed in a new development with a supermarket on one side and some sort of cinema complex on the other? They will be placed where people will be enticed to pop in once they have done their shopping or, even worse, before they have shopped for the family for the week.

Many new players will be attracted by the prospect of a life-changing jackpot from category A machines. Less time to reflect on the consequences of stuffing money that someone can ill afford into a one-armed monster will mean that more people will, on impulse, do precisely that. The Bill will lure more people into casinos, and some of them into the swamp of addiction and debt.

What will be the gain? Where does the pressure to allow these super-casinos and unlimited prize machines come from? Where are the public demonstrations in London demanding more gambling rights? Is this why we face every day the protest in Parliament square? Is that the noise that is being made? Are people demanding more gambling rights? I do not think so. The pressure, as we have heard, is coming from international gaming corporations that want to open our markets for their profits, as they have elsewhere.

There is nothing wrong with making profits, but why should we open ourselves up to the inevitable social consequences that will follow just to add further to the already bulging waistlines of foreign fat cats? We should not go down that route.

We have heard about the Australian experience. Of course, it is different from what we are discussing. Although the Secretary of State has tried to reassure us that there will be some sort of restriction because of market or industry predictions about the number of super-casinos, if no restrictions are placed in the Bill there is no guarantee that over the next five or 10 years there will not be a major casino in every community.

The House feels strongly about this matter. The right thing for the House to do is to vote down the Bill on Second Reading. The right thing for the Government to do is to listen, take note and bring back a better Bill.

8.39 pm

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): I am a gambler. I love gambling. I love the thrill of being beside the rails at a race track cheering my horse home or tearing up my betting slip in frustration. I love going to casinos to play roulette and I love going to Walker's bingo hall in Selby, which is one of centres of the community where people meet their friends. When the great Selby floods occurred three or four years ago, the community met in the bingo hall to discuss its response because the bingo hall was the only building big enough for the purpose.

I hope that I will not be accused of being a snob or do-gooder if I express my profound doubts about aspects of the Bill. To paraphrase a former American President, "It's the machines, stupid." Frank Fahrenkopf, the president of the American Gaming Association, told the Joint Committee that slot machines are now the economic driver for the casino industry. The hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) was right that the Bill will be a massive culture change. At the moment, casinos in this country contain 800 category B machines with a maximum payout of £2,000; one new super-casino will contain more machines than that. No one in the British industry wants those machines.

In the past few days, the British Casino Association has said that its reputation for integrity and honesty, the need for a low level of problem gambling and the recent public debate mean that no category A machines should be located in this country. The other casino operators' associations have long held that view, as has the British Amusement Catering Trades Association, so no British organisation based in the gaming industry advocates those machines.

It is not hard to see why British gaming associations take that view. The Secretary of State discussed prevalence studies and examining experience, but experience around the world, whether in Australia or in America, shows those machines' potential addictive capacity. The Bill will allow rows and rows of machines to be situated in gambling warehouses. The machines are designed to mesmerise people and keep them making three or four pulls a minute to try to win £1 million.

I do not want to be distasteful, but some big casino warehouses in the States change their carpets every three months, because some gamblers are so keen not to miss out on a win that they do not go the bathroom and stand in front of the machine all night. [Interruption.] It is distasteful, but it is true, and that is how addictive some of those machines are. We must examine whether we want category A machines in this nation and whether we should restrict them.

One argument is that if one has doubts about the Bill, one is elitist and is stopping the emancipation of the working classes by preventing them from going to casinos. If one examines who goes to casinos—I do—it is a cross-section of the British population. Only 7 per cent. of people currently go to casinos, and BACTA conducted a survey of their social class: 26 per cent. are A/B; 31 per cent. are C1; 22 per cent. are C2; and 22 per cent. are D/E. People who go to casinos are spread around the regions, one third of them are women and they are ethnically mixed, so casinos currently attract a small but diverse percentage of the population. The argument that some parts of the country do not have access to casinos is strong, and I can understand changes to the permitted area system and having some new casinos, but not in the way envisaged in the Bill.

I want to say a word about the Bill's implications for bingo. The bingo industry has tried, with some success in recent years, to build upon its strengths. What will happen to bingo as a result of the Bill? One cannot mix bingo, roulette wheels and machines in small casinos, but one can mix those activities in large casinos and really big regional casinos. The Government's regulatory impact assessment says that > "the regulations may lead to the formation of combined bingo clubs and casinos with a gaming floor of over 1,500 square metres",

> "might lead to an increase in machine gambling among C2, D and E income earners and a reduction in bingo admissions."

It goes on to say that

> "a widespread conversion of bingo clubs to casinos, which offer greater opportunities for machine gambling for their profitability, presents a risk of an increase in problem gaming among present bingo players."

We must think seriously about the extent to which soft and hard gaming should be mixed up. There is no need to be elitist about this. We can learn from the American experience—60 per cent. of all profits at Atlantic City are made from pensioners. The big casino companies bus in pensioners, offer them a couple of free games of bingo, then say, "You've got an hour to wait until the bus home—why not have a game on the slot machines?" That is the economic driver. If we do not have such a mix in small casinos, why should we have it in large ones?

The question of whether size matters has been debated. As the Secretary of State said, the Government have raised the minimum size of small casinos to 750 sq m. They rejected the Committee's view that for regional resort casinos it should be raised to at least 7,500 sq m. If size matters among small casinos, why does it not matter at the top end of the market as well?

This has been a fascinating debate in which virtually every Member—bar two, I think—supported a limit, to some degree, on large resort casinos. Almost no one adopted the Government position that it should be left to the market, because most of us recognise that this is a major, radical change that will, according to the regulatory impact assessment, benefit the casino industry but harm much of the rest of the gambling industry. There will be a series of unintended consequences across much of our social fabric. For example, many community pubs depend on small category C machines, and it is not clear whether those that serve food as well alcohol will be able to keep them.

I urge the Government to think again and to put a cap on the number of super-casinos—a move that would have widespread support in the House. I take the leadership of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), whom I will be proud to follow into the Lobby. We need to send the Government the message that unless they compromise in Committee or on Report, an amendment will be tabled to try to impose such a cap; and, given the tenor of today's debate, that could turn out to be an interesting vote. I therefore appeal to them to think again and to legislate in the interests of the entire nation—those who gamble and those who do not.

8.47 pm

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole) (Con): I agree with the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) that this has been an interesting debate. The speeches made by hon. Members on both sides of the House show that there are substantial differences between us. The subject certainly stirs up a lot of passion. It makes a refreshing change to come into a Chamber that is relatively full by the standards of today's House. I know that many of those who want to participate may not have the opportunity because of time constraints, but it makes a substantial difference if Members are here listening to the arguments and a certain amount of dialogue takes place across the Chamber.

As Members of Parliament, we all, through our constituency surgeries and mailbags, get a good handle on where there has been bad law in the past and what should be a Government priority in future. Gambling is not necessarily an area that I would have said we needed to jump into. I have learned a great deal during the debate from Members who have lived with the issue over a period of time. The legislation that the House has passed previously, which goes back principally to the 1960s, has done a pretty good job for this country and has lasted very well.

At that time, the aim was to create a legal industry and to keep it away from crime. We have created a very successful industry in which last year £63.8 billion was gambled in one form or another, of which £7.8 billion resided with the industry—£3 billion for gaming, £2.3 billion for the national lottery and £2.5 billion for horse-racing associated gambling. There are also 130 casinos and a quarter of a million gaming machines in the country, so we do have a pretty successful industry. We have been left, however, with a bit of a compromise, in that gambling is available to those who go and look for it, but we do not have the kind of in-your-face casinos that entice us in with flashing lights and fountains that we see in foreign countries and places such as Las Vegas.

The 24-hour membership rule means that people have to be pretty committed and think through the consequences before they go in and start gambling. This has been an impediment. I have always thought that that rule was a bit like the warning on a cigarette packet. Anyone who is tempted is made to think again and consider their position before they start to participate.

I am sure that most of our citizens, being sensible people, like a bit of fun. We have heard that quite a few Members of Parliament like to have a bit of fun gambling small sums of money. However, gambling can be addictive, and some people have a problem with it. I think that we have all come across people who have gone out in the evening with their car and arrived home without it, or who have ended up having to pile up loans on their house. As politicians, we must pay attention to the fact that the consequences of the Bill could be very dire indeed for some people. The Henley Centre has suggested that there are about 400,000 addicted gamblers in this country, and has expressed concern that these proposals could lead to a considerable increase in that number. I do not think that we, as legislators, should lightly walk away from the possible consequences of what we are doing.

The legislation that we already have on the statute book has passed the test of time pretty well and left us with a robust industry that is free of crime and works pretty well. We all understand, however, that the internet, remote communication and online gambling have changed the name of the game, and that there now needs to be a change in the law. I am sceptical, however, about whether we need to redo all the legislation. The moment we start to do that, we shall find that the vested interests of all sorts of people who benefit from the present legislation will be threatened. This applies to quite a lot of fish and chip shop owners in Poole, as well as to people who run takeaways and minicab firms, who might be surprised to lose their gaming machines.

There is also widespread concern in the leisure industry, including the ten-pin bowling industry, and among certain pub people that, under the Bill as it is presently framed—we hope that it will be amended in Committee—they, too, could lose their gaming machines. Many of these are small businesses that derive a good percentage of their income from these machines, so the changes that the Government are trying to push through present them with a challenge.

Members on both sides of the House have talked about the penny-pushers and the grab-a-toy and grab-a-gift machines in seaside town entertainment centres, which provide relatively harmless fun. These, too, could be encompassed by the legislation if we are not careful. Almost all the small businesses that have written to me have expressed some concern and many have made a pitch for grandfather rights in regard to keeping particular privileges. I hope that the Committee, when it gets to work on the Bill, will look carefully at the interests of the small businesses that will be affected by it.

I have concerns about the super-casino concept because it would change the culture of this country. We must therefore be very careful about how we proceed. The history of our legislating on this matter is to be gradual and cautious, but the Government are departing from that in their present proposals. The suggestion of the Joint Committee that we should limit the number of casinos per region was probably more sensible, and the proposals from hon. Members on both sides of the House for pilot schemes in certain areas also have their attraction.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): The Secretary of State has argued that the opposition to the Bill is born of snobbishness. It certainly is not; it is born of a concern for aesthetics, and for what we want our towns and cities to look like. I certainly do not want them to be dominated by pubs and clubs where people can drink all day, and by casinos where they can gamble all day and night. This debate is about what we want for our country, in terms of amenity and quality of life.

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend makes a good point, and many in the country would agree with his sentiments.

There are difficulties in relation to what may be a massive increase in the number of machines and the increase in the number of casinos. We may be moving a little too fast, and I would want such development to slow down. As we have heard, if, as it appears under the current proposals, super-casinos can go to centres of population, they may go to more prosperous areas, which may mean that places such as Blackpool, which have been looking forward over the years to such leisure visitors, may lose out if centres such as Manchester are allowed to develop super-casinos. There is a dilemma over to how we allow larger casinos to develop.

I am not a fundamentalist on this matter. In some of our seaside resorts, if casinos provided people with an added reason to visit, hotel rooms would be upgraded and the salaries of many local employees would increase, which might be a boon. If that development were replicated all over the country, however, it would not have the advantages of a place such as Blackpool because it would rely purely on local trade.

The point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) was important—a local authority can reject any casino in its area. Once it gives permission for one, however, it is pretty much impossible to stop permission being given for further casinos. He also raised the problem of saturation. Of course, there is a market reason why there may not be saturation, but equally it may be that all the casinos pile into one area. On the south coast, for example, Poole might decide that it did not want casinos, whereas two miles down the road, Bournemouth might be saturated. That may be a decision of Bournemouth borough council, but it might have an implication for good or ill on my constituents in Poole. I see the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), who represents an area a little further along the coast, is nodding. Those issues must be examined in detail in Committee.

Other aspects of the Bill are welcome, such as tidying-up some of the lottery legislation, particularly, as was mentioned, in relation to hospices. I welcome parts of the Bill, but I have concerns about the general thrust and the spin that the Government have put on it, and which has caused such concern in some of our national newspapers. I suspect that we will debate the finer details of the Bill for some time. If I am lucky enough to be chosen to sit on the Standing Committee for the Bill, I hope to do my best to protect some of the small businesses in my constituency.

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to follow my neighbour, the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms), whose contributions in the House are always thoughtful. I refer the House to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests as chair of the all-party leisure group. In that capacity, I enjoy the services of the group's secretariat as provided by Business in Sport and Leisure, whose members include those who will be affected by this Bill.

In addition to representations from the industry, like many other Members, I have received briefings from the Salvation Army and the Methodist Church, among others, as well as representations from constituents concerned about the negative effects of gambling and, conversely, from those wanting to protect their amusement arcade businesses. I very much welcome the Secretary of State's assurances on that earlier.

While I do not envisage a super-casino adorning the shores of South Dorset, my constituents will of course be affected by the Bill. For example, if the Bill is passed, children in Weymouth will no longer have access to fruit machines suitable only for adults, kids in Portland will no longer be able to gamble on the internet as easily, and if a child in Swanage should manage to side-step those regulations, for the first time, those responsible for allowing that child to gamble will be liable to prosecution.

Just as I welcome those new protections for children, I welcome the regulation for the first time of betting exchanges and fixed odds betting terminals. I also welcome the new industry-funded trust of £3 million each year to counter problem gambling, and the creation of a gambling commission that will monitor problem gambling and have the power to investigate, prosecute and enter premises, seize goods, void bets, levy unlimited fines and remove gambling licences. These new protections are essential in an industry that has been transformed by technological advance since legislation last came before this House in any substantive manner, more than 30 years ago. The legislation has to be modernised now, as many people have said, and we would be sleeping on the job if we did not act.

I have been concerned for some time with problem gambling, hence parliamentary questions that I tabled in January about plans to ensure that the gambling industry funds a trust to help those with such an addiction. I have therefore observed from afar the problems in Australia, which some Members have mentioned. The recent modernisation of gambling in Australia is often cited as a reason not to enter into such a process in this country.

In fact, the Australian model has served to demonstrate the dangers of unrestricted liberalisation under the banner of modernisation, and has proved a timely example of what not to do here in the UK. Problem gambling has soared in Australia because of the decision to allow high-end gambling machines in everyday high street locations, such as pubs, bars and restaurants. For example, in Victoria and New South Wales, there are no restrictions on these "pokie" machines, so exposure has risen dramatically. In contrast, the Gambling Bill proposes that machines be removed from 6,000 unlicensed high street locations. This is a completely different form of modernisation from the Australian pig in a pokie.

Many Members would prefer that this issue simply go away, but contrary to what the media would have us believe, we are not introducing gambling to the unsuspecting UK consumer. Gambling is here now; it is popular and it is not going away. Many Members may not be aware of the extent of prizes currently available in bingo halls. My hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) spoke eloquently about bingo halls and I am sure that he has played the national bingo game. Some 500-plus licensed bingo clubs link up every night except on Christmas day, and prizes of £100,000 on weekdays and £200,000 on Sunday nights—the Sabbath—are offered. On selected occasions, prizes can range from between £500,000 and £1 million, and the highest pay-out so far in a bingo hall was £985,000. Indeed, it is ironic that although companies such as Gala and Rank offer those prizes as part of a national game of bingo, under this Bill such prizes in their casinos will be limited to only £2,000.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): What does the hon. Gentleman expect the average spend to be in an evening in a bingo hall? I suspect that it will be no more than £15, whereas the average spend in a large casino in the United States is some $150 per person.

Jim Knight: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman asks that question, and I can tell him that the average spend in a bingo hall is £30 a week, and £60 a month in a UK casino. Individual punters in this country spend more on bingo than they do in a casino.

Ultimately, most people realise that the best way to leave a casino with a small fortune is to go there with a large one. Despite all the opportunities that we currently have to gamble, the two angels have not yet descended on the gates of Sodom, and society is still intact. The UK has a successful and highly responsible industry, as many Members have said. The national debate thus far has seemed oblivious to this fact, and we can improve the Bill by building on the success of our domestic industry.

Put simply, it is not the role of Government to restrict unreasonably or to suppress artificially an industry that has shown itself to be responsible. Rather, it is their rôle to create an environment in which business can thrive and individuals can act free from constraint, and in which regulations and safeguards ensure that the vulnerable are protected, and that the integrity of our social fabric is maintained over the long term. The Bill aims to strike that balance and I will vote in favour of it this evening. Given that 90 per cent. of it increases public protection from the negative effects of gambling, it is surely logical for Members from all parts of the House to give it a Second Reading tonight, and then to thrash out our differences over the other 10 per cent. during the remaining stages.

In the second half of my speech, I will focus on that 10 per cent. I share the concerns expressed about letting the market determine the number of regional casinos. I am worried that we seem to be standing ready to throw the doors open to a plethora of relatively unknown, untested and outsized casino operators, with unproven social responsibility credentials here in the UK. I am concerned that the market free-for-all that the Bill would create in respect of regional casinos will compromise its aims.

We currently have one of the lowest rates of problem gambling in the developed world. If we are to preserve that, we surely need to be able to monitor the situation as it unfolds. The currently favoured big-bang approach would not allow that, and it could therefore negate some of the protections introduced by the Bill, consigning them to the status of mere retrospective measures. We have the opportunity now to adopt a more gradual roll-out, allowing the progressive relaxation of regulations, while monitoring the effects and ensuring that the protections are effective. Why not take that opportunity?

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that a more gradualist approach would also allow our indigenous business sector, with its well-deserved reputation for integrity, to leap in as a builder of this sector? It would allow our businesses to benefit themselves, as it is not open only to international investors. Internationally, not just America, but South Africa, Europe and others will be involved.

Mr. Knight: I quite agree; that is precisely the tenor of what I am saying. A gradual roll-out would allow the established British industry to adapt to the new regulatory framework and to compete on more equal terms. Its solution would be to delay the introduction of category A machines or the capping of their stakes and prizes for an initial period. Meanwhile, the stakes and prizes for category B machines could be raised, perhaps up to £10,000, effectively narrowing the gap between large and regional casinos.

I can see the self-interest in those proposals and I am cautious in case it negates the regenerative effect while allowing the later proliferation of category A machines in the existing 130 casinos. Their limited size would mean fewer actual machines than in the regional casinos, but I understand the Government's view that we should restrict the number of outlets and their geographical spread. Personally, I am attracted to the Joint Committee's alternative proposal of an aggregate national cap on the number of category A machines, as outlined earlier in the debate. However, those in the industry who argue that we should retain membership are correct. In that respect, I agree with those on both sides of the House. I believe that the directive on money laundering will require proof of identity, so there would be little extra regulatory impact in requiring membership. I agree with removing the 24-hour rule, but believe that membership adds a moment of reflection for the individual and a helpful form of control for the operator.

Some sort of cap on the number of regional casinos, at least in the short term, would assuage fears of a gambling explosion and allow us to test the market over time. My constituent, Mr. Dave Harkison of Swanage, e-mailed me last week, suggesting a limit of two per region, which I think is pitching it in roughly the right place. That limit might be best achieved through planning.

I very much welcome the effective veto that will be granted to local authorities to determine whether or not they will allow casino development in their area. I am pleased that the Government will introduce a new planning class use—a very helpful step forward. We must ensure that regional planning boards are effective and provide a strategic lead on planning. I support the proposal of the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) that regional planning guidance should provide the mechanism.

Despite many questions and concerns that remain at this stage, I find much to welcome in the Bill. I regret that its purpose has been so misrepresented in the media and that media sensationalism has stymied real debate over the important issues. The blurring of the Government's message may account for some of the more extreme press coverage that we have seen, but we must reverse the process and inform the public of the Bill's true value. As I see it, the Bill provides more protection, more freedom and huge potential investment for the regeneration of downtrodden towns and resorts. I support the aims of the Bill. I look forward to working with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, voting with her this evening and then seeing what can be done to limit the number of super-casinos.

9.8 pm

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): First, I have followed the debate on this area of the law throughout my time in the House. As the Minister and other hon. Members are aware, I have, not once but twice, been the shadow spokesman for my party on gambling—first when the Home Office was the responsible Department and again until May this year now that gambling is the responsibility of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. My first involvement was as the Member for Blackpool, South in my first Parliament.

I should refer hon. Members to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests, as many other hon. Members have done, but point out that the major part of my speech this evening will be about casinos. The British company that asked me to do some consultancy work for it after I left the Opposition Front Bench in May is not involved in that field, so there is no conflict of interest when I speak about casinos.

My involvement in considering the original plans for resort casinos began when I was approached in the very early 1990s by Leisure Parcs, which was the pioneer of the concept in the UK. The main people behind the company—Mr. Trevor Hemmings and Mr. Marc Etches—came to the House at that time and gave briefings on more than one occasion to Members of all parties who had an interest in the matter. They pointed out the way in which resort casinos in other countries, particularly in parts of the USA, had successfully been used to create regeneration.

The main burden of my views throughout the history of the Bill—the Budd report, the Government's White Paper, all the work of the wonderful Joint Committee, which as many have said has been so ably led by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), and all the work by Members of all parties—has been to try to ensure regeneration. I share that view not only with my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale, but with my hon. Friends the Members for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale), who is on the Front Bench and for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page), as well as with the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) who is on the Government Back Benches.

If the Bill is not right by the end of its parliamentary process, the great irony will be that the very people who have spent years trying to promote the idea of resort casinos might find that the areas where they have been trying to pioneer the concept do not benefit. As Members from all parties have said, if we do not get it right and mega-casinos are allowed to proliferate everywhere, the run-down resorts that most desperately need regeneration will not end up with super-casinos and will not be regenerated. That is why the Government were so unwise not to accept all the recommendations of the Joint Committee.

In the short time available to me, I want to address one or two points that have not been mentioned so far, although the debate has been of high quality. Many influential Government Members in another place were members of my hon. Friend's Joint Committee. I welcome the concessions that the Secretary of State has announced today on such things as use class orders, and I want to consider the Bill constructively. I hope that I am lucky enough to serve on the Committee that will consider the Bill. I expect that it will be given a Second Reading because of the Government's huge majority, despite some Government Back Benchers voting against it, but I should point out that the Labour peers who served on the Joint Committee made it clear in all their work that they cared about regeneration just as much as I do. I therefore hope that in Committee the Government will be prepared to accept—at least to consider seriously—many amendments, because I suspect that if they do not do so, they will have to accept amendments from those influential Labour peers who served on the Joint Committee.

Throughout my time dealing with the industry, I have worked closely with the British Amusement Catering Trades Association—BACTA. Its concerns, on behalf of small arcades and machine manufacturers whose businesses are not restricted to seaside resorts but can be in any town in the country, must be safeguarded. I share the concern that hon. Members have expressed that if we end up with a Bill that damages the existing casino, arcade or racing industries, the Government will have done a very bad day's work. I hope very much that we will not end up with such a Bill.

I recognise in particular the importance of a national strategy on planning guidance, as the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood and my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale have rightly said. I hope that the Government will think carefully about how the Bill can be amended to ensure that casinos can provide regeneration and that they are located where that regeneration is needed most.

I doubt whether I am the only hon. Member to suspect that the Government ignored the Joint Committee's recommendations because of the dreaded influence of Her Majesty's Treasury. One can imagine the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with all the disapproval that he might initially have felt, given his background in the manse, for expanding casinos, telling Ministers in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, "If you must do this, I've at least got to maximise the tax take." I believe that that is why the Government have decided not to accept the Joint Committee's recommendation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is desperate for new tax revenue to plug the black holes that are becoming increasingly apparent in the rest of his policies.

We support something that has a positive benefit, especially for run-down seaside resorts. We must be careful that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister does not get the planning guidance wrong. The planning confusion that the Joint Committee's report clearly sets out poses a genuine danger.

Regeneration must happen in a way that is similar to successful examples in some cities in the United States. With other hon. Members, I had a presentation from the mayor of one of those cities. If I recall correctly, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman), who chaired the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport, on which I now sit, said that the Bill should include something akin to a section 106 agreement. Such a provision would enable the money that the casinos make to be hypothecated so that local communities get it. The Treasury and Governments of both parties have had a fixed objection to anything that smacks of hypothecation. However, it needs to happen. We now have some forms of hypothecation, for example, the use of money that is raised by speed cameras and the congestion charge.

The Secretary of State has been under huge pressure from her Back Benchers about the needs of the seaside arcades, the need to keep crane machines and coin-push machines, the potential problems for pubs and the need perhaps to allow the lowest category of machines to stay in fish and chip shops and pubs. On the basis of research, we do not perceive any great danger from those but there are potential difficulties, in the view of many trade associations, in the case of a massive proliferation. Several hon. Members have spoken about the dangers of organised crime and the problems of the so-called FOBM and FOBT machines.

I agree with the comments made early in the debate by the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson). She spoke about the need for Blackpool and similar resorts to reinvent themselves. If the Bill is amended sensibly in Committee and the Government accept the sort of proposals that my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale and the Joint Committee made, we can get the measure right and provide for regeneration.

I want briefly to make a couple of other points. The British Horseracing Board suggests that the Bill provides an opportunity to deal with so-called sleeper bets. As a long-standing member of the all-party group on racing and bloodstock, I believe that the Committee stage could helpfully deal with that.

All those with an interest in racing will be worried by the news last week from a senior police officer, who is in charge of the current inquiry into some people who are involved in racing, that further arrests have taken place and that those under investigation now number more than 100. The huge inquiry will continue well into 2005. I shall not comment on any matters that are sub judice, but for the good name of racing, it is crucial that it is perceived to be a clean sport. I believe that it is 99 per cent. of the time. However, the Bill could stop betting on horses or dogs to lose. That would be helpful.

9.18 pm

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I am not much of a gambler. The last bet that I placed was on the outcome of the 1997 election—I like to bet on certainties. However, I am a trade unionist and I want to approach the debate from a slightly different angle: the perspective of the casino worker. I declare an interest as a member of the GMB, which supports my constituency party and is one of the main unions that organise casino workers in the United Kingdom. Currently, 90 per cent. of casino operators in the UK are trade union-organised.

In partnership with the Transport and General Workers Union, the GMB has formed an alliance with Unite Here, the United States trade union that organises casino workers on the other side of the pond. It has provided valuable advice and assistance to the UK unions in approaching the debate. It showed that casinos can be significant creators of new jobs. We are considering not only jobs at the gaming tables but a range of ancillary services, for example, in catering and hotels. Those staff and services make a wider contribution to the regional economy. That, however, depends very much on how the industry is regulated, and the approach to the work force. A good employer can create worthwhile careers and decent conditions for casino workers; a bad employer means exploitation, poverty wages and appalling working conditions.

That is illustrated by two examples from America. In Mississippi, the superficial reality is that when casinos were allowed tourism increased, as did tax revenues for local communities; unemployment declined, and there were more jobs. The real reality, though, is that the fastest-growing jobs were low-wage jobs; erratic and round-the-clock work schedules made child care difficult; and jobs were of poor quality, with unstable work loads, limited prospects for long-term stable employment, and little hope of career advancement.

Contrasting evidence comes from Atlantic City, about which we have heard a good deal in a different context. All 12 casinos there are union-organised. Between 1977 and 1996, the income of casino workers—cooks and housekeepers—increased by more than 100 per cent., compared with only 16 per cent. for similar workers in the state of New Jersey more generally.

I believe that companies with bad employment records should not be allowed to operate in the United Kingdom. An example is the Las Vegas Sands casino, whose chief executive is a man called Sheldon Adelson. I have seen a detailed briefing on his activities, provided by Unite Here's research department. It is pretty horrific. He has been described by the Las Vegas Review-Journal as

"perhaps the most vilified man in Nevada."

He has been involved in repeated conflicts with governmental and regulatory agencies. Earlier this year the Nevada Gaming Commission imposed a $1 million fine on the Venetian casino, which he owns, for rigging contests and violating other Nevada gaming regulations. He is in ongoing litigation with the United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission over issues dating back to 1999. He is an extremely litigious individual. I suspect that the Government's triple-lock proposals would lead to a number of legal challenges and judicial reviews should he be allowed into the UK.

Mr. Adelson has come under fire over working conditions, for failing to remit proper back pay, and for attempting to have workers and their supporters arrested for protesting. He subcontracts a substantial number of jobs, with substandard wages and benefits. He uses his wealth to try to oust politicians who cross him—so I am probably on his hit list now, as some other Members may also be after tonight. He has repeatedly been characterised as difficult to work with, and as "terrorizing those who get in his way."

That is the sort of person whom we could end up dealing with. We must ensure that such operators have no place in the UK's gaming industry.

The gambling commission must be required to take into account a casino operator's previous employment practices—overseas if necessary—when deciding on an application. I believe that there should be at least two employee representatives on the commission to represent the interests of the workers in the industry. An applicant should be required, in particular, to show that he has enhanced family-friendly policies to compensate for the unsocial hours that casino workers have to endure, and that he pays due consideration to the health and safety of staff—especially as casinos will no longer be "member only", and there could be much looser controls of customers and the risk of assaults by dissatisfied customers. There should be help with travel arrangements for those who must work late and antisocial hours; and there ought to be a smoke-free workplace for those who must work such long hours.

Operators should also be expected to provide decent careers and training opportunities. There are good examples of that in Las Vegas, where a scheme administered jointly by the union and casino operators has financed a job training school for catering workers. Some 2,500 students take advantage of the programme each year, and the number is expected to double over the next couple of years. That is a good example, but I think a training levy would be a more effective way of ensuring that those who work in casinos have proper career opportunities.

It is likely that national lottery income will fall if people use other forms of gambling. I think that casino operators should also be expected to replace any losses sustained by the lottery through a levy for a good causes scheme to support charities that might otherwise lose out.

I share many of the reservations that have been expressed about the expansion of the casino industry with the regional super-casinos. It is important that we consider the number of casinos that will allowed, but if, as I think is inevitable, there are more casinos, whether on a pilot scheme or regulated by legislation or the market, we must ensure that those who work in the casinos are properly looked after, that their interests are represented by the gambling commission and that we do not import into the United Kingdom rogue operators, but operators who will provide a decent working environment for their staff, with decent careers and decent job opportunities.

If casinos are properly regulated, they can make a major contribution towards employment in Britain and towards economic regeneration, but that depends on their being properly regulated. I hope that those views will find favour with the Government and that we will see some amendments to the Bill as it proceeds to protect the interests of casino workers.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): The origins of the Bill were to provide Blackpool, and probably no more than Blackpool, with a resort destination casino, and for the past two and a half to three years, Blackpool has campaigned hard to be considered for that resort destination casino.

If one looks at resort destination casinos in Las Vegas, one sees an interesting product, which is not just about the gambling floor but which offers a wide range of entertainment to people of all ages, with subsidised restaurants to attract families and with subsidised accommodation so that people spend as much as possible on the gambling floor. I do not think that anyone here has an objection to the high quality environment that exists in Las Vegas being transported into the United Kingdom. The objections come when we move to the Bill where the idea of one resort destination casino has changed to possibly 20 or 30, and, it has even been said, 40 regional casinos.

I am pleased that the Government have listened to at least one part of the protest that has raised its head in these proceedings, and, in particular, what Liberal Democrats were calling for in relation to category D machines, which the Government have now conceded can continue to operate, but, according to the Secretary of State, a reserve power will be kept. There is a problem with that in that an amusement arcade operator will think twice about investing in future category D machines. That power could well lead to uncertainty, and we may have pushed the Government halfway there to at least conceding that category D machines should not be included in the Bill, but we now need to push them a bit further not to have that reserve power in the hands of the Secretary of State so that those amusement arcades are safe.

I want to raise an issue that no one else has raised and that is the position of offshore water-based gambling on ships. Would a vessel that is permanently moored be a regional casino under the Bill and, if it was moored in one place and then moved to another, which local authority would license it? It is not beyond the realms of possibility that an entrepreneur could convert a vessel into a casino and moor it within our territorial waters, providing a shuttle service to land in order to maximise the reduced costs of operating a casino at sea and to get round some of the tighter regulation that the Government rightly pride themselves on having included in the Bill. I should like to know whether the Government have considered that possibility. There is also the possibility of riverboat casinos, which may be small casinos, but the question remains as to which local authority would grant the licence.

We have heard that the Bill creates a new gambling commission, which will have responsibility for regulating all forms of gambling. The Secretary of State said that it would have the duty to oversee those who wish to enter the gambling industry. As the Government's proposal for lots of casinos is aimed at bringing in money from overseas—mostly from the United States—I wonder whether it should be based in Las Vegas rather than in Newcastle upon Tyne, at least for that part of its work that involves investigating the background of those who want to operate casinos in this country.

The Government say that the Bill will increase opportunities for adults to gamble, while decreasing opportunities for children to gamble. They say that the expansion will bring economic and regenerative benefits. In a few resorts, casinos may well do that, but I cannot see—I have not heard a strong case for it tonight, nor have I seen any evidence to support the Government's case—that 20, 30 or more regional casinos would bring such benefits.

The new casinos could be huge buildings incorporating not only gambling facilities but restaurants, stage entertainment, retail outlets and even housing, and unlike other casinos, they will be allowed to have category A gaming machines with unlimited jackpots. Those who have not visited a category A environment, as found in the United States, do not know what they are letting themselves in for. These places are geared to maximise the amount of money that people spend, and they operate for 24 hours a day in a windowless environment with no clocks in sight.

There is clearly a need to reform our gambling laws, which pre-date the internet and the concept of online betting. There is also a case for relaxing the 24-hour membership rule for small-stakes bingo, whereby holidaymakers in my constituency, for example, have to be turned away from bingo halls unless they applied 24 hours in advance. Nobody argues that the laws do not need some reform, and we welcome parts of the Bill, but we have major concerns about the casino proposals. It strikes us that it is no coincidence that the UK, with the tightest rules on gambling in the world, has the lowest rate of gambling addiction per head of population.

The right of individuals to choose whether to use casinos has to be balanced against the potential social cost of gambling, and especially so-called problem gambling. Indeed, it has been estimated that each problem gambler costs the state £35,000. Government research shows that casinos in accessible locations that offer casual gambling pose a heightened threat of gambling addiction.

Other social costs can include late-night noise and disturbance, but local authorities do not have sufficient powers to consider those factors in licensing casinos, while in contrast, the new alcohol licensing laws allow for refusing planning permission on the grounds of public nuisance or saturation. I hope that that can be considered in Committee, if the Bill gets there.

I fear that, unless it can be amended, the Bill will open the door to mainly US-run and owned super-casinos with no real stake in the community other than a mission to extract as much money as possible from punters' pockets. With it could come the associated crime and criminality of the Las Vegas underworld. I fear that the Government's claim that they wish to encourage economic regeneration will in fact lead to social degeneration. The idea that seaside resorts were at the heart of the original proposals will fall by the wayside. If major cities are allowed to have super-casinos, that is where the punters will stay. They will not be attracted to the seaside resorts.

I suspect that the Government are going down this route because they are looking for a mechanism to achieve the economic regeneration of, mostly, inner cities without having to increase taxes. We on the Liberal Democrat Benches know that you get what you pay for. The Bill could be something for which we end up paying a very high price indeed.

9.35 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): I have only a few minutes in which to sway the House with a couple of points. My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) asked rhetorically whether there were not enough gambling opportunities in Britain already. I remind the House that Britain has more casinos than any other European country except France. There are more casinos here in London than in any other capital city. The Government now invite us to add more regional casinos, which is the big bone of contention that divides so many of us on the Labour side and the Opposition from the Government.

The solution is to split the Bill in two: 90 per cent. of it is non-contentious—let it sail through. If we are told in few moments' time that that cannot happen, I shall vote against my own Government with a very heavy heart. I shall not vote for Second Reading. [Interruption.] Some of my colleagues are chortling, as they would, but let me tell them why I will do that. They will have read the briefing from Citizens Advice on the link between gambling and over-indebtedness. It said that the Bill will be a real kick-start to compulsive gambling in this country, and that is not funny at all.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) said, we are talking about a completely new phenomenon—one-armed bandits with unlimited payouts. Someone on the Opposition Benches spoke of a gambling environment where people cannot distinguish between night and day: that means 24-hour gambling and the glittering promise of multi-million pound prizes that will draw people in. We—a Labour Government, for God's sake—should not be doing that. We have more important things to concentrate on.

People talk about problem gambling. The Henley Centre tells us we have about 370,000 problem gamblers, and it forecasts that that number will rise to 700,000 by 2007. Without the Bill, it says, the increase would be much shallower. If we pass the Bill—let us not kid ourselves—we will see an exponential increase in problem gambling. People ask why that should happen here where we have tightly regulated gambling. Just look at what happened in Australia, which does not have such constraints. About 0.8 per cent. of United Kingdom gamblers are problem gamblers, but in Australia it is 2.3 per cent.

I am not being disloyal to my own Government; I think I am being a candid friend in saying that they should let us have two Bills. If they will not do that, we must vote the Bill down.

9.38 pm

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) and his Committee for their outstanding work. It has been said more than once that if the Government had listened more carefully to the Committee's recommendations, particularly those in its second report, they would not be in the mess they find themselves in.

Modernisation of the gambling laws is long overdue. The current law has been overtaken by technological changes such as the availability of internet gambling and betting exchanges. We accept the need for change to address such issues. We also support the Bill's stated objectives of protection from harm, fairness and prevention of crime and disorder resulting from gambling.

As our reasoned amendment sets out, we do not support the parts of the Bill that discriminate against our indigenous British industry, which has worked hard over the past 40 years to establish a reputation for responsibility, probity, integrity and safety. It is surely the role of Government, when introducing new legislation, to promote a level playing field and a licensing and regulatory regime that does not discriminate against British-based operators in favour of foreign-based investors.

Inward investment is welcome, but it should be balanced, fair and complementary. It is disingenuous to argue, as the Government do, that new investment in regional casinos is open to all, when one group of potential investors is working with one hand tied behind its back. Existing casinos will not be able to compete if the Bill remains unchanged, since it denies them any category A machines. It is generally accepted that the presence of such machines will bring the punters over the threshold. Indeed, so crucial are such machines to the development of the resort or regional casinos that the Americans have told us that they would not contemplate investing here unless they had access to them.

To continue that theme, concern has been expressed in the press about special treatment being afforded to foreign-based casino operators, largely American, who have perhaps been offered the carrot of favourable tax treatment on the one hand, and on the other a strong Government lobby to improve anti-money-laundering EU directives. That point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride). The Association of Chief Police Officers has also made representations to the Government about money laundering. It is vital that the Government assuage any fears in the industry that they are doing anything that could be interpreted in any way as favouritism.

There is also the question of the Government's true motivation in introducing the Bill now, which several hon. Members raised. Indeed, there seems to be confusion at the heart of the Government over why they are doing so. The Government told the Joint Committee that a key aim of the Bill was to raise revenue, which was a point that my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) raised. However, a special adviser in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport contradicted that by saying that the expansion of regional casinos would be revenue-neutral.

The Government make much of the potential for regeneration. Indeed, at times they seem to be positively seduced by the prospect of substantial investment in deprived areas. Regeneration, however it comes, seems extremely attractive on the face of it, not only to run-down and deprived areas but to the many local authorities that are looking to promote economic development in their areas.

The hon. Members for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) and for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) posed the essential question: what is the definition of regeneration? Is it to be consistent and recognisable in each region of the country? Does the planning system allow for measurable benefits to accrue from permissions for regional casinos?

To move on from that point, but to remain with planning, there is an unanswered question about section 106 agreements. Are they morally right? My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir Brian Mawhinney), the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright), my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) and the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) talked about planning permissions being predicated on handouts and enticements generated from the profits from gambling.

Perhaps the key question relating to regional casinos is that of proliferation—a matter raised by many hon. Members on both sides of the House, including my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale and the hon. Members for Great Yarmouth and for Selby (Mr. Grogan). The Joint Committee sought in its second report to address that problem by setting for regional casinos threshold sizes of a minimum overall floor area of 7,500 sq m, of which 4,000 sq m would be used for non-gambling activities. The Government chose not to accept that recommendation, but in doing so failed to address the potential for proliferation. That is where their public relations started to go badly wrong.

Given the problems of gambling addiction, which my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire, my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) and the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) raised, it is surely necessary for the Government to have a view on the potential accessibility of gaming machine gambling. That means that they should not only have a clear view of what would be an appropriate number of regional casinos—and hence on accessibility of category A machines—but establish and promote clear unequivocal mechanisms in legislation that will achieve their objectives. Many hon. Members spoke out against leaving that to market forces, and the Government's failure to give a clear steer on that question is at the heart of their credibility.

Several hon. Members argued that the control of numbers could be achieved by putting in the Bill a cap on the number of casinos. That could be done in a number of ways, either as an absolute number overall or as a limit per region—say, two—with regional planning authorities and local authorities determining the location of casinos through existing or amended planning legislation.

Other hon. Members asked for pilot schemes or trials in one or two locations, but these proposals are light years away from the Government's expectation of having from 20 to 40 regional casinos. Who came up with these figures? Many hon. Members—the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders)—questioned the rationale behind the assertion made, and no conclusive arguments were forthcoming from the Government, so we are left concluding that there is no rationale, and the Government are left looking at best disingenuous and at worst incompetent and uncaring. We are being asked to take a quantum leap into the dark, and I get the strong impression from tonight's debate that a significant number of hon. Members are not prepared to give the Government the benefit of the doubt on this issue.

Labour Members have challenged the Opposition many times during the debate not to vote against Second Reading. If they really want reasons for voting against it, they should look no further than the excellent speech made by the hon. Member for Bridgend or, for that matter, the voting intentions of some of their own Back Benchers. Given the track record of this arrogant Government, why should we trust them to allow the fundamental changes that we require in Committee to the clauses that we strongly oppose, which chiefly relate to regional casinos?

This Bill leaves too many unanswered questions. What is to be the tax regime? When will the Treasury publish its proposals? What could be the effect on indigenous British casino operators? How many regional casinos will there be? Why should we believe assurances of close working with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on planning issues? What is the scale of potential increase of gambling addiction? These and other questions trouble the House as a whole. They may cover only a proportion of the Bill, but they are disproportionately represented in the scale of their potential impact. Given the record of this Government, we believe that the only way to bring about change is to challenge their fundamental thinking head on. That is why we shall not support them on Second Reading this evening.

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): This has been an encouraging and, to a large extent, constructive debate. Some 30 Members have contributed, for which I thank them. The quality of the debate reflects the concerns and interests of hon. Members on both sides of the House. The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir Brian Mawhinney) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) put a very strong case in arguing for no change to a large extent. That reflects an attitude something like that of my mother, who is a very strong Methodist and is 87. She gave me a lecture when I took her to church a week last Sunday on why there should be no change. Such matters split families as well as the House, but I genuinely look forward to continuing the lively debate in Committee, because I believe that that is where these changes can start to take place.

I want to remind the House where we have come from in the past five years. Five years ago, Professor Budd was asked to look at gambling in this country. The Lords deregulation Committee asked him to do so, and many people were concerned at the time that remote and internet gambling had to be brought under control and addressed in law. In 1968, a Labour Government had to legislate to bring gambling under control, remove it and clean it up. Indeed, I believe that Budd, "A Safe Bet for Success" and the pre-legislative scrutiny Committee—I congratulate the Committee, which worked under the able chairmanship of the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway)—brought to the House considered work, along with a Bill that will restore control over gambling. That has been central to the Government's thinking, as it was in the 1960s. We must do the same at the beginning of the 21st century. More importantly, we must look at legislation that can respond to the ever-changing needs of society as it is today.

I ask Labour Members who are thinking of voting against the Bill to look at Budd, the work of the pre-legislative scrutiny Committee and what we said in "A Safe Bet for Success". This is about protecting the vulnerable. The three principal parts of the Bill are protecting children and vulnerable adults, keeping gambling crime free and making sure that gambling is fair and open. That has been the bedrock of this—

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): The candyfloss society. That is what Harold Wilson called it.

Mr. Caborn: It might have been the candyfloss society in 1968 when Harold Wilson introduced the Gaming Act and brought gambling under control, as we will.

Let me deal with the key points raised by hon. Members on the capping of regional—

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Caborn: Unfortunately, I cannot give way. I have only 10 minutes left. Those on the two Front Benches have tried to get as many Back Benchers in as possible. That was the condition.

Some have suggested that the national cap on regional casinos ought to be 20 or 30. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State explained the tough triple lock that we are putting in place through the Bill. First, there will be the gambling commission. Then, under clause 157, there will be local powers for a licensing authority to say no if it wants no new casinos. Finally, there will be a tough planning system. We are confident that this combination will put casinos in the right place, run by suitable people, and keep them out of places where they are not wanted.

A number of hon. Members spoke about the Government acting together. The combined planning and licensing systems will achieve regeneration in the right place. Regional planning bodies will be able to specify suitable locations for regional casinos. Several hon. Members asked how those could be directed to places of need. If casinos are proposed outside the appropriate areas, the proposal can be referred to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

We have strengthened the planning regime further with the announcement from the Secretary of State of the use class order, so there will be no escaping the location controls that we envisage. Suitable locations for regional casinos will be considered by regional planning bodies. If they think regional casinos can help to regenerate seaside resorts, they can guide developments to those areas.

It has been interesting to hear the numbers bandied around. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) suggested a formula for one or two casinos per region. With nine regions, that would make 18 regional casinos, plus Scotland and Wales, which would give a total of 22. The bottom line proposed by the industry is about 20—between 20 and 40. The official Opposition Front Bench spokesman spoke of regionalisation. The official Opposition and the Liberals intend to vote against Second Reading, claiming that we will not direct the proper number of casinos to the regions, yet their proposals would produce more regional casinos than projected by those in the industry.

The risk to problem gamblers was another topic of concern. If there is a risk to problem gamblers because of the location of casinos, the gambling commission can advise against licensing them in those locations. The licensing authority must have regard to such guidance. I am trying to answer serious questions that were posed about the potential for development on estates in built-up areas to encourage problem gambling. That would be covered by the commission's guidance on licensing, and we would expect it to act accordingly.

The hon. Member for Bath asked about individual applications and how they could be rejected. They can be rejected under clause 157. We have said clearly that that would not contravene any European measure. To suggest otherwise is to mislead the House. The provisions of the Bill would enable local authorities to take action so that casinos were not located in built-up areas.

If we had taken the Budd review at face value and incorporated its recommendations in the Bill, many Opposition Members would have argued forcefully against the proliferation of casinos, because that would have meant many more small casinos than proposed in the Bill. The Joint Committee's recommendations would have meant more casinos, with category A machines being used in the large casinos. It is estimated that the recommendations would have doubled the number of casinos. We have taken a cautious approach, and a number of Members asked us to do so. We estimate that the increase will be about a third. Given the Budd report, the outcome of the scrutiny Committee and the contents of the Bill, we have taken a cautious approach.

There are real concerns, and there are some who have had the opportunity to visit Australia, where gambling has got out of hand. The Australians deregulated in a way that even they wish they could roll back, but that is difficult. We took a great deal of advice from people in Australia and throughout the world, and that is why we have adopted our approach. One of the recommendations from the Joint Committee that we did not accept was a 3:1 ratio for machines to tables. We have proposed 2:1. We tightened up on that recommendation. The Joint Committee recommended category A machines in all casinos and we have recommended such machines in only regional casinos. Again that is a cautious approach and a tightening up of the process.

The Joint Committee recommended an increase in stake and prizes for machines in small and large casinos. We have kept them at their present level, which we believe is the right approach. Via the gambling commission there can be an incremental release over a period if it thinks that that is necessary. We have, as it were, moved back from the Budd report and from the Joint Committee and we have a much more cautious Bill than the measure that would have been if the recommendations of those two bodies had been taken forward.

The hon. Member for Bath talked about the Human Rights Act 1998 being used to resolve local conflicts. We have checked that through and we believe that what the hon. Gentleman said was incorrect. Local authorities are allowed to consider more than the three licence objectives when resolving local issues on casinos. They are able to take the views of local communities into account. They are unable to do anything that is unlawful or irrelevant to them.

Some red herrings were raised. My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) said that sports would be denied revenue from the machines. That is totally untrue. The situation will be exactly the same as it is now. There was a lot of debate about working men's clubs—

Kate Hoey: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Caborn: I said that I would not give way to anybody, so there are no exceptions to that.

Working men's clubs, Conservative clubs and British Legion clubs made representations. We shall ensure that they are protected and will continue to be protected.

The Budd report recommended removing arcades from seaside resorts. We have not done that. I believe that there are effective proposals for the regeneration of casinos within the Bill. We can get on with regional regeneration in a way that many would want, particularly those in resorts.

Registration for casinos and members' clubs is allowed. Any casino that wants to run a registration system can continue to do so. The matter could be up to the gambling commission. If it believed that that was desirable within the licensing structure, it could ensure that that would be the position.

The Bill sets out a clear direction for bringing gambling under control again, as we did in the 1960s. If Members vote against Second Reading, they will be allowing young people—children—to be exposed to internet gambling, to remote gambling, in a way that would be wrong and irresponsible. We can take the other parts of the Bill on board. We can deal with the issues relating to regional casinos in Committee. I am sure that we can find a solution to the problems that have been raised.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House proceeded to a Division.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I see an hon. Member using a mobile phone. I instruct him to leave the Chamber.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Bill read a Second time.

GAMBLING BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Orders [28 June 2001 and 6 November 2003].

That the following provisions shall apply to the Gambling Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on 11th January 2005.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on the day on which proceedings on consideration are commenced.

6. Sessional Order B (programming committees) made by the House on 28th June 2001 shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): There seems to be a conspiracy among the authors and authoresses of school textbooks that publish information that is never close to being interesting. There are of course exceptions. The writers believe in formula, which dulls interesting phenomena such as climate change and questions such as why are there seasons; the mists, why; the storms, why; and why do birds know the prospects of weather change even more sharply than Penny Tranter or even Michael Fish—if I want to know the weather I watch the birds rather than the BBC or ITV? Do people really contemplate the planet we live on? Are we mystified about where we come from? The Queen is worried about climate change. Did hobbits with small brains once roam the earth? Other questions include, how did the Norfolk broads form, and how do our brains and hearts function?

That is what school teaching, and higher education, too, should be about. It should be attractive, because we really want to know. The fault lies, I think, in our education, which is still seen by many as a chore, something that they really have to suffer.

School trips and field trips are an important part of education. They give us the opportunity to view our heritage, to be inspired and to be instructed. We can understand where we come from and the county where we live, enabling us to feel proud. I want to talk particularly about science field trips to such places as the Norfolk broads and the Holt and Wells study centres, which are a small part of what goes on in Norfolk. What we do in our counties can help with how we handle issues on the planet.

I have been sent evidence from the Norfolk environmental education service, and I conclude that it is struggling to advance its services to our young people. For example, it operates two outdoor education centres—the Eagle canoe club and Filby water activity centre, near Great Yarmouth. It is working with Whitlingham trust, just outside Norwich, to deliver water-based learning opportunities in the new Whitlingham country park, which has had great amounts of money from the New Opportunities Fund and Sport England's active England programme. It is being overseen by the Norwich rivers heritage trust, which is full of good folk from the region who are interested in young people going to that new outdoor centre.

From the environmental education service, I learn that minibuses are in decline, that the centre needs more support and help and that more people are unable to fund field work opportunities at A-level. Interestingly, it says that pupils cannot afford that, but I think it is the schools are having the trouble. They are cutting back and having trouble with visits and exercises in the field.

We are all very proud of the investment in education and the new schools, but why not involve young people in the schools in planning the new buildings so that they can feel proud about how the buildings can be constructed to deal with the environmental problems that are created? What a good way that would be to learn about environmental policies and science.

Let me return to school visits. Outdoor centres are fine, but my experience as a governor of schools and from trips that we have set up—and, of course, as a constituency MP; people write to us and we are lobbied by the Field Studies Council, the British Ecological Society, the Royal Geographical Society, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and so on—is that there are many problems. Many people are frightened by health and safety legislation. I deprecate what the NASUWT has said about the problems and its encouragement to teachers not to involve themselves in vibrant courses that are part of the education process. Other unions do not feel quite as bad.

We need to note that accidents are pretty rare. Figures I have seen from the Adventure Activities Licensing Authority show that there have been 57 deaths on school trips, 19 of which occurred during adventure activities between 1985 and 2004. The figures are not increasing, but the perception and fear of litigation remains a serious concern for teachers, provoked by organisations that ought, in my opinion, to know better. Risk can never be avoided in life, but what a chance field trips offer for students to think positively, examine risk and learn about risk and management as part of life skills.

Bird migration, frog spawning and similar issues can be raised. Why are there four seasons, I often ask myself. Do other people ask that, too? Why not five, for goodness' sake? I cannot think what the fifth might be, but it is interesting that those are questions people may ask.

There is a new subject called phenology, and I find that there are science centres—one at Bayfordbury in Hertfordshire—where the study of nature's calendar is very important. There they find that, for example, chestnut trees bloom sooner, and many other things happen at different times of the year—and they ask why. We cannot just say, "Climate change," to people without them asking, "What is climate change?" I think that we should be able to expect our young people—our kings and queens—to understand climate change, but they will not be able to unless they can observe, ask the questions and do the experiments during their education.

We often live in a world of fear, and it is time to dispel that feeling. When an Education Minister, a colleague of my hon. Friend the Minister who is here tonight, told me that people do not need to see the milky way for real because they can watch it on a computer screen, I started to think of phrases such as "heathen" and "poor soul". People need to see the thing for themselves.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): My hon. Friend will know of my involvement with geology in a previous life. Does he agree that one of the great ways of exciting young people about the science of geology, and to get them to think about the planet on which they live, is to take them to some of the more exciting rock outcrops and show them some of the great fossil deposits? That cannot be done in a lab.

Dr. Gibson: I absolutely concur. Although there is great stuff on the media, such as the programmes made by the BBC unit in Bristol, that is not enough. There is nothing like seeing things for oneself and asking questions. That is what inspires, and makes people want to study science and get involved in some of the mysteries of life—because we definitely have not found out everything yet, and more ought to be done about it.

There are other factors that inhibit people from doing field trips. At key stage 2, participation in field work is rather sporadic and varying, and individual school commitment is often dependent on a specific member of staff; when that individual leaves the school there is a vacuum.

There is a need to bring back field work in biology. It is statutory in geography but only "recommended" for science. Very little field work is undertaken at key stage 3, despite the national strategy for science, and the situation is little better at key stage 4. The skills shortage of biologists with field work experience in schools will be perpetuated unless biologists themselves provide access to specialist field courses; I compliment organisations such as the Field Studies Council, which is doing that.

My figures say that the uptake of A-levels in biology and geography is falling nationally, and that there is difficulty in planning field courses because students will not commit themselves to A2 until they know their AS results. It is often easier not to teach ecology-based modules.

Funding has become a major issue. It is difficult when parents decline to contribute voluntarily, as is often asked of them. As a governor, I know about that—and of course, the poorer kids do not get encouragement from home, because of financial restrictions. School budgets are often too small to remedy deficits. When the money comes through from central Government to school budgets, often that money is not used for field courses, but is diverted into other pathways—worthwhile pathways, no doubt, but we miss out on that particular type of activity. Schools withdraw from making residential visits, and that means that inclusion and fair opportunity for all in education becomes a real issue.

There is also a lack of training to prepare teachers. This is an essential argument, I say to those weary willies who argue that health and safety is an issue. Risk management, and teachers going out of the classroom, is important both for initial teacher training, when people have the opportunity to study field sciences, and for serving teachers. There is a need for all key stage 2 teachers and all science specialists at key stage 3 and above to receive some training during ITT.

Serving teachers are doing a wonderful job in the classroom—but gosh, we could do a lot more in their training to make them want to get out there and see the world as it really is, to understand the patterns of life and impart them, and to instruct young people and give them the enthusiasm that takes them onwards. We have a history of academic field work in our education system; it is a learning mechanism and helps personal development. We want to ensure that quality can be delivered in an atmosphere of safety, allowing all pupils the opportunity, and the right, to such experience. I say that it should be for the many, not the few—a phrase that will be familiar to those who are present.

I do not think that the answer that I often get from my schools about sponsorship of the school pond by a local industry is enough. Of course, that is fine, but I want to see ring-fenced moneys to ensure that our young people are sent out there to look at things in a safe environment. In that way, we will solve many of the problems that everybody talks about, holding their hands up and saying, "Why don't young people want to do these interesting subjects?" If we do not give them the chance to go out, see things and ask the questions, and if we do not have a curriculum that encourages them to do so, is it any wonder?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on securing this important debate, which is also timely, considering that this subject has been under consideration by the Select Committee on Education and Skills.

Shortly before the summer recess, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set out our Department's five-year strategy for children and learners. As part of that strategy, we place great emphasis on the challenge for every school to be an environmentally sustainable school with a good plan for school transport encouraging walking and cycling, an active and effective recycling policy and a school garden or other opportunities for children to explore the natural world. We also say in our challenge for secondary schools that we want to widen opportunities beyond the classroom. Those opportunities often provide some of the most memorable experiences at school, such as being involved in the school trip or drama production, or playing in the school team.

I would like to place tonight's debate very much in the context of those commitments in the five-year strategy. There is a relevance across the curriculum, as I think my hon. Friend set out powerfully in his speech, in science, geography, personal social and health education and citizenship. There is an enormous challenge, of which he reminded the House, to make science in the curriculum exciting and attractive for children and young people throughout their school days.

The 10-year science and innovation framework sets out the Government's ambition, and in particular, the contribution to be made to economic growth and public services by science. Clearly, science education is absolutely central. My hon. Friend referred to the national network of science learning centres for teachers and technicians. There is a major £51 million partnership between the Government and the Wellcome Trust to enable those centres to be established and to act as a focal point for the profession, pulling together regional resources to help improve science teaching and learning. The first three regional centres opened their doors on 1 October this year, with others already offering courses on other sites in the interim, and all nine due to be open at the beginning of the next school year, next September.

One aspect of the work of those centres is enabling young people to learn about and use field work, to manage interesting experiments in the laboratory and to have confidence to use a range of strategies together with in-depth subject knowledge. We have funded both the Association for Science Education and the Geographical Association to develop training courses that will increase teacher skills and confidence in leading outdoor learning. That will be achieved through some of the science learning centres starting next year.

Clearly, freeing up teachers to teach is at the heart of the work force reform changes in our schools. The extra role for support staff is very important and can contribute to the encouragement and organisation of outdoor activities. Such staff can contribute by acting as local environmental volunteers, for example, or providing cover for a teacher who is out on field work, away from school.

In the 10-year science and innovation framework, we are committed to training a new cadre of higher level teaching assistants so that every secondary school in England can recruit at least one by 2007–08. Of course that is not enough. We also need to recruit more science teachers to enable the work to continue into the longer term.

My hon. Friend rightly reminded the House of the importance of involving children and young people in these areas. He referred in particular to the challenge of building new schools and involving young people in some of those decisions from an early stage. We have an ideal opportunity to do that with the "Building Schools for the Future" programme, which aims to rebuild or refurbish all our secondary schools over a 15-year period. As a Government we must rise to the challenge of ensuring that children and young people in our schools and in our communities are part of those decisions right from the beginning.

Last year we published, "Excellence and Enjoyment", our strategy for primary schools. That strategy encourages a rich and exciting curriculum, with better use of resources and opportunities in and beyond the classroom, to make learning more flexible and imaginative. Outdoor learning is central to the agenda of "Excellence and Enjoyment". I am pleased at the welcome that the document received not only in education, but in terms of the environment and outdoor learning. Getting children out of the classroom to explore the natural world is a powerful way of making science and the broader curriculum come alive. I tread with care when I disagree with my unnamed ministerial colleague whom my hon. Friend mentioned in his speech. I have no doubt that there can be no substitute for the excitement of outdoor learning and seeing the natural world with one's own eyes.

There is an exciting joint project between science learning centres and the Woodland Trust to tie in with the BBC's spring theme. Each of the regional centres is providing training for primary school teachers on how the arrival of spring can be measured by identifying trees in bud and the appearance of insects. Schools will be able to record their results on the Nature Detectives website as part of a national experiment. These are projects that we want to encourage, so that we can see the flowering of outdoor learning and field work, about which my hon. Friend rightly spoke.

I turn to the important topic that my hon. Friend mentioned—some of the barriers that exist or are perceived to exist to outdoor learning. It is important that we build the case for such learning. I concur with my hon. Friend in paying tribute to the Field Studies Council for the work that it does. The study that it published earlier this year provides us with substantial evidence that field work effectively planned, well managed and well taught can offer learners opportunities to develop their knowledge and skills in ways that add value to the everyday educational experience in the classroom.

Our own programme, "Growing Schools", is funding further research, including in-depth case studies at outdoor sites, and investigating teaching and learning processes, learning outcomes and wider benefits. We are also conducting action research with a group of teachers, field centre staff and farm educators to trial teaching and evaluation strategies. That will report in April next year.

I very much agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of school trips. I recognise that there are barriers to schools doing field work. There are practical issues and others that are less tangible. I am keen to send out the message that we want to help and support teachers in realising that by following good practice, we can ensure that visits are as safe as possible, and we can be confident that unfair accusations against teachers and other staff can be swiftly dismissed. Our own investigations through "Growing Schools" show that there is a generally shared view of the barriers to schools undertaking learning outside the classroom. We want to work with everyone—the teacher unions, the head teacher associations, the other unions, the "Growing Schools" national advisory group and the whole range of national organisations—to make sure we get this right. I would also like to put on record my thanks to the subject associations, especially those involved with geography and science, for the important role that they are playing in supporting us in developing this important work.

We have produced practical and well-received guidance on health and safety, with five booklets aimed at specific target audiences for local education authorities, for schools and for group leaders, and these are available on our teachernet website. We are doing all that we can to manage the risks. There are risks—my hon. Friend is right—but it is possible for the current system to be harnessed in the way that he described to the educational benefit of children and young people in our schools.

Some people are also keen on the idea of a statutory entitlement to a set number of days of outdoor learning and I can see some attractions in that sort of approach. What we want to do, and what we are doing as a Department, is to work closely with a wide group of partners towards a common vision. A number of our partner organisations have put to us the idea of an outdoor learning manifesto and I am keen to explore that further.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me this opportunity to respond on behalf of the Government and for making a powerful case this evening for the importance of field work in science, in geography and throughout the school curriculum at every stage. I join with him in saying that I think there is a continued and, I hope, growing role for that excellent work in the outdoor classroom.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Hospital-acquired Infections

1. Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): If he will make a statement on the (a) incidence and (b) cost to the NHS of hospital-acquired infection in the last period for which figures are available. [194999]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): Because we were the first Government to introduce mandatory surveillance of the incidence of hospital-acquired infections, previous data are not as robust as we would wish. However, previous surveys and estimates indicate that the proportion of patients who acquire an infection in hospital is around 9 per cent., which is largely unchanged from a survey conducted 24 years ago in 1980. The rates of infection in most other European countries range between 6 and 10 per cent. The best available estimate is that hospital-acquired infections cost the NHS £1 billion a year.

Ann Winterton: Hospital-acquired infection is currently a massive problem in this country, and the Government's solution is to reintroduce the matron. Will the Secretary of State confirm that matrons will be taken from experienced nursing staff, will be properly trained and will therefore have the authority and professional standing to close wards for thorough cleaning, to recruit additional infection-control nursing staff and to train others in infection control? Does he agree that if those safeguards are not introduced, the matron's charter will be yet another piece of meaningless spin, which will be costly for patients?

Dr. Reid: I regret the hon. Lady's choice of last sentence. I accept that hospital-acquired infections are a major challenge for the NHS and for all of us. I do not regard the matter as a party-political issue, which is why I invited the Conservative spokesman, who has accepted the invitation, to discuss the matter and share ideas and proposals. I confirm that we will examine all proposals.

It is not true that we have been involved in spin. We are the first Government to collect the data, which are admittedly limited—it is difficult to obtain some data for international as well as domestic reasons. However, we are passing power to front-line staff and the chief nursing officer has been put in charge. We want to make sure that nurses and matrons are in control of not only hygiene, but hospital cleaning, and that they are involved in writing up contracts. Hospital-acquired infections are a long-standing, complex issue, and I hope that all hon. Members share my determination to tackle them.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): Last week, I visited three wards in Lewisham hospital, each of which contained two patients with methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus. Those patients had entered the hospital with the condition. Has my right hon. Friend any advice on community action to try to reduce the incidence of that condition and, in particular, for nursing homes, where far too many elderly people may unfortunately be subject to that infection?

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend is right. Staphylococci are present outside hospitals, and methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus is, of course, the most difficult Staphylococci to tackle. MRSA is dangerous in hospitals because the people there are, by definition, ill, weak and, in many cases, elderly, and it is so dangerous for vulnerable patients. We will examine all ways in which to tackle MRSA, and those areas of hospitals where people are vulnerable, critical or elderly are key.

There are many reasons why it is difficult to overcome MRSA. We must tackle issues such as shortages of trained staff, old buildings with single rooms, high capacity, an emphasis on cost rather than cleaning and the bacteria's immunity. New hospitals, more staff, single rooms and hospital design are important, as well as hygiene training, infection-control nurses on the ground and control by front-line staff. All those measures are available, along with scientific research. We are tackling all those issues, and I hope that all hon. Members who have any ideas about how to put those measures into practice—in some ways, MRSA is the biggest challenge that we face in our hospitals—will join us. I welcome all ideas from all quarters.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): Why has the incidence of MRSA increased so quickly in recent years?

Dr. Reid: We estimate that the rate has risen by about 5 per cent. over the past couple of years, so the increase is about 2.5 per cent. a year. [Interruption.] We have collected data on bloodstream bacteria MRSA only for the past couple of years. The data are limited, but we have never collected them before.

As far as we can see, the incidence of MRSA is rising, and it is a major problem for us, but I issue two pleas to hon. Members to put this in proportion. First, it is not rising at 100 per cent. per annum, as some newspapers are suggesting. Secondly, the overall rate of hospital-acquired infections, which is estimated to be about 9 per cent., is roughly the same as 25 years ago, and probably 50 years ago, although we do not have the empirical data to verify that. There is no internationally-classifiable coding for deaths caused specifically by bacteria-led MRSA. Another reason why our data collection is less adequate than I would like is that MRSA is normally a contributory factor and is often not cited on death certificates. We want to see improvements in that respect, as well.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): Last August, hospital cleanliness scores were published. This year they have not been published. Why not?

Dr. Reid: That matter has been passed to the Healthcare Commission and the scores will feature as part of the star ratings.

Mr. Lansley: More talk from the Secretary of State, but no action. Perhaps he would like to admit that the reason is that last year the hospital cleanliness scores suggested that no hospital in the whole national health service had an unacceptable level of cleanliness. That did not accord at all with patient experience and illustrated the fact that the system is discredited, as the Healthcare Commission subsequently found.

Let me try the Secretary of State with another one. Last December, the chief medical officer said that there should be a rapid review process to consider new products and processes, 50 of which have been presented to the Department. A meeting took place on 24 August. On 11 August, the Minister in the other place said that reports on just six would be published by mid-October, but that has not happened—why not?

Dr. Reid: Since the hon. Gentleman said at the time that we were not independent when assessing hospital cleanliness and suggested today that the reports are discredited—I do not accept that, but it is his view—I should have thought that he would welcome the fact that we have asked the independent Healthcare Commission to estimate cleanliness in hospitals. It seems that if we do it, it is wrong, and if we ask an independent body to do it, it is wrong. That is a sign of bias rather than objectivity on the hon. Gentleman's part; he is so much better when he puts party politics aside.

On his other question, let me say in my normal balanced fashion that I would have liked the study of these materials and treatments against MRSA to have started more quickly than it did. He is right about that. The organisation has met only once and is meeting again this month. The list of six that it has considered is scheduled to be published, and that will happen very soon. It is running a couple of weeks late, but I hope that it will not be much more than that.

Mr. Lansley: I am afraid that, as we have demonstrated many times in this House, the Government's response is one of a lack of urgency and delay. The data from the patient environment action teams are not being published. When we asked why not, we were told that it was because they were awaiting ministerial approval. That has nothing to do with the independence of the Healthcare Commission.

Let me return to the point at which the Secretary of State started—that we need more data. More than four years ago, the National Audit Office said that the mandatory scheme should be extended to include all parts of the voluntary surveillance scheme that predated it and should be done on the basis of clinical specialty; but Ministers said no. Where is the National Audit Office's recommended national infection control manual, on which the Department started work in 2001? Even the matron's charter, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton), said that people would be able to refer to a model cleaning contract, yet that does not exist. Why are the Government all talk and no action? Why cannot people see the action that needs to be taken to deliver cleaner hospitals and a safe environment for patients?

Dr. Reid: Over the past few years the Government have been acting to deal with some of the very issues that the hon. Gentleman raises. He says that we are not putting out data. In fact, in July we issued data on bloodstream MRSA infections. I have to say, again in a balanced spirit, that an objective observer would recognise that during the 20 years in which they were in power the previous Government refused to publish any data. We are the first Government to have mandatory surveillance, the first Government to collect and publish the data, and the first Government to ensure that hospitals are judged on their cleanliness.

Earlier, we discussed the potential contributory causes of MRSA. On old hospitals, we have the biggest building programme in history. On lack of staff, we have brought in 100,000 more doctors and nurses. On the immunity of the bug, within a month we are bringing the best international minds to this country to tackle the problem. We are putting nurses back in charge. We have just issued the matron's charter, and the chief nursing officer is taking this over. On cleanliness, above all, I am the Secretary of State who said—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can make an appeal to the Front Benches. It is now quarter to the hour, and we are still on Question 1. I need sharper answers and sharper questions. Perhaps Paul Burstow can help us.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): Thank you for that instruction, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of State says that this Government are the first to do anything about MRSA. Surely that does not absolve them, however, if they are not doing enough to tackle the problem and there is still more to do. I certainly want to take him up on his offer of a meeting to discuss that issue. In July, he published a report promising cleaner, safer hospitals and action to deal with that. I have asked questions about that report, because it came just two days before a very critical report by the National Audit Office about the Government's performance in relation to hospital infections. The answer that the Minister gave me was that the report was a hastily cobbled together report on work in progress and contained nothing about new policies. Is that the case—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would be helpful if the Secretary of State could provide a sharp reply. At this rate, we shall only get four questions into the hour.

Dr. Reid: The answer to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question is yes; the answer to the last part is no. The answer to the middle part is that I look forward to seeing him at the meeting.

Hospitals (Wakefield)

2. Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): When he last met the chairman of the Mid Yorkshire Hospitals NHS Trust to discuss new hospital provision in the Wakefield, Pontefract and Dewsbury area; and if he will make a statement. [195000]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): The Minister of State, Department of Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) met the chairman of Mid Yorkshire Hospitals NHS Trust and local MPs in July to discuss a number of issues, including the hospital development plan. Those discussions have continued since then.

Mr. O'Brien: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does she accept, however, that we have particular problems with the new development, especially at the Pontefract general infirmary—the PGI? In a local press statement on 12 August, the chairman promised that there would be a review of the proposed bed reductions at Pontefract, because he was concerned about that. On 3 September, at a meeting of the health and social partnership, a promise of 100 beds at the PGI was made, but it was withdrawn in October. Patients who have received major surgery at the PGI are now being told that they might have to go to Dewsbury to complete their treatment, which would be a great imposition on their families, who might have to catch three or four buses to get there. Will my hon. Friend take an interest in the points that I have raised, and investigate them so that a more friendly service can be provided?

Miss Johnson: Of course I take an interest in the points that my hon. Friend has raised. As he is well aware, there is a need to get the trust back on track in regard to its financial deficit, and work is going on to achieve that. We are committed to finding a sustainable solution that will give affordable and appropriate health care to the local community, and of course I shall be interested to listen to any further points that my hon. Friend would like to make on this issue.

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say to the hon. Gentleman that Dorset is just a bit too far away from Dewsbury.

Patient Choice

3. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What steps he is taking to give NHS patients more choice about which (a) doctor and (b) hospital treats them. [195001]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): We are committed to giving patients greater choice within the national health service. We are already offering a choice of hospital to patients facing long waits for surgery, and we are extending choice to patients in regard to how they access treatment, advice and care within primary care, all of which is free at the point of need.

Hugh Bayley: I am glad to hear what the Secretary of State says about primary care, because 80 per cent. of doctor/patient consultations in the NHS involve general practitioners rather than hospital doctors. Does he accept, however, that not all GPs are the same? They have different specialist interests and training, and they perform to different qualities of care. Meaningful choice for patients depends on the patient having reliable information about the clinical practice and quality of care of individual doctors. What steps are the Government taking to provide better information to patients about primary care, so that they can have real power and a real choice about which doctor treats them?

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: if we are to give more power, information and choice to patients, we cannot restrict that to the secondary sector. Of course, we are now getting greater capacity in primary care: some 4,200 more doctors than previously; more specialisms, with some 1,300 doctors now specialising; new walk-in centres, which do not require an appointment; new commuter centres placed conveniently next to where people travel; and new roles for nurses, nurse practitioners, specialists and consultants. All of that opens up capacity, and therefore choice, in primary care.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): Does the Secretary of State recall that one of the first acts of the incoming Labour Government was to abolish the last vestiges of the right to choose which NHS hospital one wanted to go to, which had existed since 1948? Does he now propose to rescind the regulation introduced in 1999, which stopped the funding of a person's choice to go to a hospital other than the one chosen for them by the bureaucracy? Does he recognise that the current talk about choice is a welcome whiff of a U-turn on his part, but unless the Government are prepared to allow genuine choice, rather than a limited choice among hospitals selected by the bureaucracy, there will be no real choice and no return to the choice that was endemic in the health service when it was set up?

Dr. Reid: There is no legislative bar to extending choice, and as from next December, patients will be able to choose from a range of five shortlisted by the primary care trust. Increasingly, as we put in capacity, that will be extended so that by 2008, as the right hon. Gentleman said, any patient in England will be able to choose from any hospital in England, whether in the independent, charitable or NHS sectors, provided that it meets NHS standards and prices. I merely make one point: that can be achieved only because of our investment in capacity. It is a cruel deceit to promise people that capacity will be taken out of the NHS and that a greater degree of choice will still be given. We have heard for centuries that we are all free to dine at the Ritz, and only the lack of money prevents us from doing it. It is the same in the NHS—his party taking money out of the NHS will reduce choice, not extend it.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that if people are to have real choice in terms of which hospital they attend, accessibility must be a major factor in the criteria? Does he also agree that if people cannot afford to travel to hospitals, or there is no public transport infrastructure, they cannot have that choice?

Dr. Reid: Yes on both counts, which is why we provide both capacity and travel facilities. The truth is that most people want easy and quick access to quality services as locally as possible. But the fact is that after 60 years, that is not available to everyone, so we must extend it so that people can go where they choose. I merely say one thing: we do not extend choice by saying that it will be available only to those who can pay half of the cost of their operation. The charges for operations that the Conservative party would introduce represent the cruellest deceit ever perpetrated on people in this country, especially the old and most vulnerable.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park) (LD): Does the Secretary of State agree that patient choice would be enhanced if patients held their own records? Patient-held records would remove the need for complicated IT systems, because the doctors whom the patient had chosen would always have access to the information that they needed about that patient.

Dr. Reid: In theory, that sounds like an advance from the current position, in which big files often get lost. Were we all asked to keep such big files, I suspect that the same thing might happen. Now that this country is at the forefront of information technology, surely the answer is to reduce such large files to a format that can be transferred easily between providers, so that when a patient decides to go to that hospital rather than this hospital, or that doctor rather than this doctor, there are no excuses and no physical bars to that transfer. Information technology will therefore become a source of information, power and choice to patients in a modern national health service.

NHS Dentistry

4. Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the availability of NHS dental services for (a) children and (b) older people. [195002]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Approximately 6.5 million children and 2.9 million adults aged over 65 are registered with NHS dentists. We will improve on those figures by making an additional investment of £368 million in NHS dentistry, and by recruiting an extra 1,000 dentists over the next year.

Mr. Dhanda: I thank my hon. Friend, and invite her to visit Gloucester and see why we need some of that generally much-needed investment. Does she know about my constituent Terri Selby and her daughter Eleanor? My constituent was recently told that for her daughter to be given NHS dental treatment at a local practice, she herself would have to sign up to become a private patient there. Will my hon. Friend take measures to ensure that such blackmailing of people to join the private sector is prevented in my constituency and, indeed, in constituencies throughout the land?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: that is unacceptable behaviour. When such offers are made, there is rarely anything in writing. Moreover, some dentists are telling patients that they must pay a registration fee of about £40 before being taken on by the NHS. That too is unacceptable. Dentists are independent contractors and have the right to refuse to accept NHS patients if they wish, but we will discuss with the General Dental Council whether further action can be taken, in particular by means of the section 60 order that we are presenting to the House.

My hon. Friend's area is one of those receiving special support from the Department. I should be delighted to go there to see how matters are progressing.

Dame Marion Roe (Broxbourne) (Con): Given the recent announcement of an increase in the number of places at dental schools, is the Minister confident that there are enough academic dentists both to train students and to engage in research?

Ms Winterton: I have had discussions with the chairs of dental schools about how we can handle the academic side. I am very confident that our announcement of 170 extra training places, backed up by £20 million of extra investment, sends a clear message about our commitment to NHS dentistry and to training more dentists. I am also confident that it will play a big part in attracting academics to training and teaching.

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my hon. Friend for her recent visit to the Langley dental practice in my constituency, where Mr. Tariq Drabu provides 100 per cent. NHS dentistry for young and old. She will have noted the close working relationship between Heywood and Middleton primary care trust and the practice.

Mr. Drabu conducts outreach surgical sessions at the local clinic, with the support of local staff. Would my hon. Friend consider encouraging other dentists to emulate that model? It might return dentists from the private sector to the NHS.

Ms Winterton: Visiting the Langley clinic and meeting local dentists was a very encouraging experience. I know that my hon. Friend's PCT has received about £83,000 in extra support this year, and is using it to give some 5,000 more patients access to NHS dentistry.

I agree with what my hon. Friend says about that practice. It is increasing the number of patients who register, while also ensuring that dentists go into the community to reach those who do not want to register—for there will always be such people. Outreach services are important. The PCT's way of dealing with some local access difficulties is certainly impressive, and should be passed on to those in other areas.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): What success has the Minister had in recruiting dentists from European Union accession states, and how many dentists have been recruited internally as a result of her Department's £100,000 advertising campaign?

Ms Winterton: The first 30 Polish dentists will arrive in January 2005. Recruits have already come from Spain, and have been allocated to specific areas. Following discussions with the GDC, everyone from outside the EU who was on the waiting list to take the international qualifying examination to start work as dentists will have been offered a place before the end of the year.

In terms of responses to the recruitment campaign, I do not have the figures on me. I think that, about a month ago, there were about 180 responses to the initial campaign and they were being followed through at individual PCT level. It is a start, but we have a long way to go. I certainly would not deny that but, as the hon. Gentleman knows, we are also moving towards local commissioning—more than 2,500 dentists have already moved to that—with additional capacity being provided too. As we have said, we will recruit 1,000 extra dentists by October 2005, which will go a long way towards solving many of the problems that we inherited from the previous Administration.

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that we need to find some mechanism that places an obligation on dentists to provide NHS dentistry? After all, it is the NHS that trains those people and supports them through their training. It is time that they gave something back. We need to introduce a quota system to do that.

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is right. People feel strongly that, when training is provided out of the public purse, there should be a commitment to the NHS. As I am sure she is aware, there are difficulties in doing that because dentists are independent contractors and there are issues around restraint of trade, but we have tried to look at other ways, for example, golden handshakes, to organise commitment to the NHS. As we move towards local commissioning, there is the ability within the new contracts to specify longer time limits for dentists who work for the NHS to remain within it.

Tariff-based Trust Funding

5. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): What assessment he has made of the effects of his proposals for tariff-based funding of NHS trusts on the financial position of (a) the North Bristol NHS Trust and (b) the South Gloucestershire primary care trust. [195003]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): NHS trust income will move to tariff-based funding by 2008–09. Financial modelling on the impact for NHS providers will be completed by December. For primary care trusts, the introduction of payment by results will be cost neutral.

Mr. Webb: I am not sure that that response told me anything. North Bristol NHS Trust has run up cumulative deficits in excess of £40 million in the past few years and is now undergoing financial recovery, which involves some difficult decisions about current services. The movement to tariff-based funding will affect a relatively high-cost trust particularly badly coming on top of financial recovery. I am aware that the Minister plans to phase in the move to tariff-based funding but will he pay particular attention to trusts that are in financial recovery, lest he wreck the very financial recovery that they are trying to achieve?

Mr. Hutton: Yes, we will certainly do that.

Health Check-ups

6. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): What plans he has to provide the opportunity for a regular NHS health check-up for NHS patients in England. [195004]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): NHS patients already have the right to request a health check-up from their general practitioner if they have not been seen by their GP in the previous three years. People aged 75 or more can request a check-up if they have not been seen by their GP in the previous year.

Simon Hughes: I am grateful for that reply. While I share the Secretary of State's view that the last thing we want is a nanny state, will the Minister tell us how her proposals will ensure that the people who are most vulnerable and least likely to go to see a doctor are encouraged to have the check-up? What is the difference between the policies this month and the ones that were announced by the Prime Minister in July 2000?

Miss Johnson: We accept that people want more support to improve their health and we are looking at a range of ways to do that, which will be announced in the White Paper. My hon. Friends have also made some announcements in relation to health checks for people with mental health and learning disability.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that, if a regular health check is good enough for Members of Parliament, it should be good enough for every citizen in the United Kingdom, and that this is the biggest single change that could bring about the transition from a national sickness service to a national health service? What more can the Government do to encourage GPs to take such screening seriously?

Miss Johnson: We have just undertaken the biggest ever consultation on prevention and public health and there will be a White Paper coming out before the end of the year. I am sure that that will address the point that my hon. Friend has made. In addition, the contract itself already incentivises quality checks, and GPs are already operating within that new framework.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): Does the Minister not think that these health checks should look carefully at the likelihood of allergies developing, given that some 250,000 children in this country suffer from them? A Health Committee report was highly critical of the Government's ability to deal with allergies. What is she going to do about this issue?

Miss Johnson: The chief medical officer and the Secretary of State will look at the Health Committee's report very carefully over the next few weeks, and we will publish a detailed response as soon as possible.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): With advice, we can all do more to look after our own health through a healthy diet and regular exercise. When will the new White Paper on healthy living be published?

Miss Johnson: Before the end of the year.

Chiropody

7. Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): What measures he is taking to improve access to chiropody services. [195005]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): An increasing number of chiropodists are working in the NHS and entering training. Since 1999, the number of qualified chiropodists and podiatrists employed in the NHS has increased by 13 per cent., and the number of students has increased by 33 per cent.

Mrs. Lait: The Minister's robust defence of NHS chiropody provision is interesting, but if what he says is so, why are so many people being forced to leave the NHS and to go private for chiropody?

Dr. Ladyman: People are not being forced to leave. Many primary care trusts are choosing to focus specialist podiatrist services on those in greatest need, while organising other methods of access to services such as nail cutting. That is the change that is taking place, and it is a perfectly rational one.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I accept my hon. Friend's point that the change is a rational one, but does he agree that somebody who is suffering pain as a result of such a condition should not be excluded from NHS treatment?

Dr. Ladyman: Yes.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): Despite what the Minister says, the latest Government figures clearly show that the number of patients receiving chiropody care in the NHS has fallen significantly in recent years, and that many hundreds of thousands of mostly elderly patients are being denied any form of NHS foot care altogether. The Society of Chiropodists and Podiatrists has confirmed that many patients are simply being bumped off waiting lists. I put it to the Minister that there is a lottery in chiropody care, as a result of which many elderly patients are needlessly suffering. Will he now stop blaming the PCTs, which have to juggle a number of Government targets and priorities—chiropody is not one of them—stop ignoring the situation, and do something to put it right?

Dr. Ladyman: It sounds to me like the hon. Gentleman is asking for a target. The figures that we collect cannot be used in any way, shape or form to draw the conclusions that he draws, which are a complete distortion of, and misuse of, those figures. What the statistics do show is that the level of access to chiropody services is stable and has been for many years.

NHS Dentistry

8. Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the numbers of NHS dentists. [195006]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): More than 19,300 dentists currently work in general dental services and personal dental services, but not all have a full-time commitment to the NHS. That is why we are increasing that figure by 1,000 whole-time equivalent dentists by next October, and increasing the number of dentists in training by 25 per cent.

Mr. Mudie: I thank the Minister for that reply. Faced with the latest withdrawal from the NHS of a large dental practice in my constituency, I have been saddened by the PCT's slowness in assuring patients that replacement NHS facilities will be provided, and its slowness in telling them that they should not sign expensive private dental treatment contracts. Will the Minister join me in reassuring my constituents in that regard, and in helping to persuade the PCT to act a little quicker and more positively in dealing with their genuine concerns?

Ms Winterton: I certainly sympathise with my hon. Friend's point. Sometimes a PCT's ability to communicate with patients can depend on the amount of notice given by the dentist, and dentists do not always stick to giving the amount of notice that should be given. I am sorry that the practice has decided to leave the NHS, particularly when we are putting significant new investment into the service. I also understand, however, that the PCT has made arrangements for other dentists across the east Leeds area to take on additional patients. All the patients deregistered by that practice will be able to find a new dentist. I accept my hon. Friend's point about ensuring that PCTs move quickly in such circumstances.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): Despite the Minister's assurances about numbers, the availability of NHS dentistry to our constituents does seem to be declining. Has that been mirrored by a decrease in spending on NHS dentistry?

Ms Winterton: One of the difficulties that arose in the past when NHS dentists moved away from the service was that the money reverted from local to national level. In changing how the contract operates, we are now trying to ensure that, if a dentist leaves the NHS, the amount of money that he would have been paid remains at local level. That will stabilise the situation. On top of that, we have also announced an extra 20 per cent. of growth money—something like £368 million—that will go into NHS dentistry from October next year. Putting in those very necessary extra resources will bring about a vast improvement in the position.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): May I tell the Minister about the shock that hundreds of patients in Leigh felt when, without warning, they received a letter from their dental practice announcing that it was opting out of the NHS and that patients would have to pay £15 a month? As she knows, my constituency, like hers, is not an area where most people are readily able to afford such fees. I would make two suggestions. We could have more salaried dentists, making it easier to control their work load, or we could have much more widespread water fluoridation and put all these dentists out of business.

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right on the first point. When we move towards local commissioning, we are able to increase the number of salaried dentists because local PCTs will be able to make a judgment about what is most appropriate for their area. On the second point, I know that my hon. Friend feels passionately about fluoridation. He is right that, where water fluoridation is introduced, we expect the number of children with no dental decay to increase by about 15 per cent. within five to 10 years. As he knows, strategic health authorities are now looking into the wishes of local populations and we shall be setting out regulations soon. I am sure that my hon. Friend will continue to play an active part in promoting water fluoridation in his constituency.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Dentists covering the area of Box and Colerne in my constituency have recently joined a long string of dentists who have completely withdrawn from the NHS. That means that there is simply no NHS dentistry available at all in large parts of my constituency. Does the Minister remember that on 28 September 1999 the Prime Minister promised at the Labour party conference that an NHS dentist would be available for all who wanted one within two years—in other words, by 2001? Will the Minister now update us on when the whole population of Great Britain will have access to an NHS dentist?

Ms Winterton: As the hon. Gentleman probably knows, we have set up some 47 dental access centres, increased the availability of one-off and emergency treatments for patients, and provided the option to ring NHS Direct, so people can access a dentist. However, the situation is unsatisfactory, as I would be the first to accept. That is precisely why we are taking the measures that we are at the moment. SDA estimates mean that approximately 700,000 extra places will be found by using short-term access money. We estimate that the overall figure is about 2 million, but as we move to local commissioning, we are confident that it can be achieved.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): May I tell my hon. Friend that Stoke-on-Trent has been identified as an area where more NHS dentists are urgently needed? There is now a proposal for an outreach teaching centre in Stoke-on-Trent under the auspices of the Birmingham dental school. Will she take account of the urgent need to establish such a training centre for new dentists in the town as soon as possible?

Ms Winterton: Outreach centres are certainly an issue we have been looking at. A lot of evidence suggests that dentists tend to cluster around dental schools, so in considering training it is important to look at how we can put people into different areas. I have had some discussions about that with the chairs of the dental schools, and proposals will be put forward. A working group has been set up between the Department of Health and the Department for Education and Skills to look at some of the issues, and I shall make further announcements shortly.

Delayed Discharges

9. Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): What assessment he has made of progress in reducing delayed discharges from hospital. [195007]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): The report "Better Health in Old Age", published today by Professor Ian Philp, highlights the progress already made on delayed discharge, which has fallen from 6,419 adults delayed in acute hospital beds in December 2001 to 2,619 in June 2004. That is a fall of almost 60 per cent. in less than two years, which has released capacity of 1 million bed days a year. That is equivalent to building eight district general hospitals.

Mrs. Brooke: The Commission for Social Care Inspection has found that pressure to free up beds is forcing staff to transfer people into nursing homes when a home care package might be preferred. Is the Secretary of State content that the needs and wishes of vulnerable older patients are fully taken into account when targets are pursued? Should we consider whether the target or the needs and wishes of the people should take precedence?

Dr. Reid: I beg to differ with the hon. Lady: the report found no such thing. It contrasted bad practice with good practice, and we want all local authorities and everyone involved to follow the good practice that it highlighted.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his efforts. In the city of Newcastle, the problem of bed blocking has largely been resolved over a period of 12 months.

That said, at a meeting in about four hours' time, the new Liberal administration in Newcastle will declare the position of director of social services redundant. That gives me some concern about whether our developments and progress will be maintained. Will my right hon. Friend keep a close eye on that?

Dr. Reid: I am surprised and disappointed to hear that. As my hon. Friend pointed out, we have made fantastic progress on delayed discharges and have put in very high real-terms increases for social care funding. The national delayed discharge grant of £100 million has assisted with that. I am pleased to reassure my hon. Friend that there is still a statutory obligation that means that someone will have to be appointed to be in charge of adult social services.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): While I congratulate the Minister on the decline in the number of those requiring to be discharged from hospital, what total and what percentage of those discharges are now being dealt with by intermediate carers?

Dr. Reid: There has indeed been a very welcome increase in intermediate care, and I hope that that will continue. I do not have the exact figures, but we have put great effort into making sure that the transition from hospital to home in the community is one that has been facilitated by resources and capacity. If I may, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman with the exact figures.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton) (Lab): I congratulate the Secretary of State on the improving figures on people being held in hospital instead of going home or to other places. It is the case, though, particularly around this time of year, that a lot of elderly people suffer accidents, and there are other winter problems. What capital or other resources are being put into local hospitals so that they are better able to provide for the elderly at this time?

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend is right to say that we are putting tremendous effort into making sure that hospitals are prepared for the winter. Although we have coped extremely well over the past three winters—some of the terrible sights that we previously saw did not appear, which is to the credit of NHS staff—we should never take that for granted. One bad viral infection or the spread of something like a variant of flu can always make things very difficult, which is why I am glad that, despite the problems with Chiron, we are now on stream with flu vaccines so that anyone who wants one should certainly be sure to get one.

Other very simple things could be done, such as our efforts to protect old people from falls. Some 400,000 old people a year seriously damage themselves through falls. We have a simple programme, laughed at by some aesthetes, called the sloppy slipper programme. Those 400,000 often injure themselves because of faulty footwear, which can be simply remedied, with a great deal of relief for everyone. There are also intermediary care facilities in which 330,000 people, many of them old folk, are assisted between hospital and home.

Royal United Hospital, Bath

10. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): If he will make a statement on the financial situation of the Royal United hospital, Bath. [195008]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): The trust is working with the Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire strategic health authority to achieve a recurrent balanced financial position. In order to assist in this process, the Department has deferred the repayment of deficits and provided significant and sustained direct financial support through the SHA in each of the past three years.

Mr. Heath: Anyone who knows the RUH gives credit for the standard of surgical and medical nursing care there and pays tribute to the efforts of the management team, in combination with the Government, in putting things right. The fact remains, however, that patients at the RUH still pay a penalty for the management mistakes of years ago. In a context of increasing resources for the NHS, surely it makes sense for the RUH to start with a level playing field from which it can build, rather than a deficit from which that is more difficult.

Mr. Hutton: I think we all agree in principle with the hon. Gentleman. The truth is, however, that the money has to come from somewhere. If he is going to wipe out a deficit, it has to be paid for by other parts of the NHS. To imagine that anything else is possible is the fantasy-land politics that large sections of the Opposition inhabit.

Health Trust Funding

11. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): What account is taken of local wage rates in allocating funds to health trusts; and if he will make a statement. [195009]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): NHS allocations policy has taken account of differences in local wage rates since 1976. The market forces factor, within the funding formula, addresses variations in costs in delivering care, such as higher recruitment and retention costs. The formula is reviewed by an independent body, the Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation. Decisions on the 2006 to 2008 allocations have still to be made.

Matthew Taylor: What the Minister does not say is that historically the impact of different wage rates in the private sector in the wider community have been mitigated both by a balancing factor, so that neither the highest nor the lowest is fully factored in, and by counting the poorest 46 of the 177 wage areas as one group, effectively raising the poorest areas—Cornwall has the lowest wages of any—up 46 places in the rankings. Why is the Minister determined to implement, through the tariffs, a system that will tie the amounts paid to local hospitals one to one to local wage rates, when national pay scales apply in the NHS, leaving the poorest areas to get the least NHS funding—with, I understand, no academic research to back that up? Will he at least place the detailed research to justify that in the House of Commons Library?

Mr. Hutton: Ministers act on the advice of the independent experts who have historically provided that sort of information to us. We are trying to be fair to everyone across the NHS. My hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) recently discussed that with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

I am surprised by the hon. Gentleman's impression that something is fundamentally flawed with the market forces factor and that it should not be taken into account. He might want to read paragraph 4.63 on page 25 of Liberal Democrat policy paper No. 68, which says:

"Funding will be"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I instruct the Minister not to waste the time of the House.

Ms Candy Atherton (Falmouth and Camborne) (Lab): There have been real improvements in Cornish health care in recent years, and I am grateful to the Government for that. However, there is concern in the county about the issue. Will my right hon. Friend reassure me and my constituents that the vital investment in Cornish health services will continue?

Mr. Hutton: I am certainly prepared to have a serious discussion with my hon. Friend about that, but I can tell her that the Liberal Democrats have no answer to the problem.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): In my constituency, there are two enterprising sets of GPs—in Ellesmere and in Oswestry—who want to take advantage of competitive local wage rates and expand the service and the number of people they employ, but they also depend on allocations of funds from central Government to the primary care trust. The Minister's colleague, an Under-Secretary of State for Health, wrote to me on 15 June saying that those allocations to PCTs would be made "in the autumn". Today is 2 November. When in NHS terms does autumn end and winter begin? When will we know about those figures?

Mr. Hutton: We hope to make allocations to primary care trusts very soon, but we are waiting for figures from the Office for National Statistics on population growth. Given the representations that Ministers have received, it is important that we base the allocations on the most up-to-date information about population growth, because they are capitation payments. We hope to be able to do that in January.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my right hon. Friend for the £233 million increase in strategic health authority funding since 1997, which has allowed us to have nearly 2,000 extra nurses and about 84 general practitioners. On the market forces factor, I thank him for the discussions that he has held with me since I raised that matter in March. It is my understanding that there has been some progress over the summer and I hope that he will continue to discuss it with us, as he has just indicated. Does he agree—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is about the third supplementary question that the hon. Lady has asked. There should be only one supplementary question.

Mr. Hutton: We shall certainly continue those discussions with both my hon. Friends. In fact, the NHS in the south-west peninsula has received additional funding of nearly £400 million and I doubt very much whether that would have come from any of the Opposition parties.

Mental Health

12. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future provision of care for mentally ill mothers with babies in the north-west of England. [195010]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): Mental health services throughout England are going through a radical programme of modernisation to improve access to effective treatment and care, reduce unfair variation and raise standards. National standards for mental health have been set through the mental health national service framework and the standard of care for mothers in the children's national service framework.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Will the Minister give some indication of what assessment he has made of the effect on patients and their families of the proposed closure of the mother and baby unit in the mental health unit of Leighton hospital, which serves the Macclesfield constituency? With the closure of that facility, will he confirm what specialised provision there would be for mentally ill mothers with babies in Cheshire, Wirral, Merseyside, north Wales, Shropshire and the north Staffordshire area? That matter is very important to my constituents.

Dr. Ladyman: I am sure it is, but it is also very important that mothers with such problems in the hon. Gentleman's constituency receive the right sort of care, and usually that is best provided at home. The decisions that have to be taken are local and my understanding is that the local trusts are increasing provision at home, which means that there has been decreasing demand for those beds, so trusts have to take a view as to how best to provide in-patient services. That is what they are doing and I encourage the hon. Gentleman to engage in that consultation.

General Practitioners (Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire)

13. Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): What his estimate is of the number of general practitioners needed in the Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire strategic health authority over the next 20 years. [195011]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): It is the responsibility of Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire strategic health authority to analyse the local situation regarding GP numbers and vacancies and to develop plans to provide the best possible primary care services for its residents. That process began in April 2004. Currently, there are 957 GPs in the SHA area, an increase of 74 since 1997.

Alistair Burt: The Minister's brief may also tell him that an internal paper from the Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire strategic health authority states that the number of vacant GP posts in the area, currently 72, is expected to rise to 139 within three years and to 233 by 2011, and that over the next three years the SHA needs to recruit and retain the equivalent of 332 full-time GPs. That is long before the completion of the 160,000 new houses anticipated for the area by 2031. Where will those GPs come from, and is not the pressure to build new houses in the area so great that it is stretching precious infrastructure—physical and human—just too far?

Dr. Ladyman: If the hon. Gentleman had bothered to read the report to which he referred a little further, he would have seen that there are detailed plans on where the GPs will come from. The plan was produced because the local primary care trust was doing its job and forward planning to ensure that it could meet the challenges in his constituency.

Barbara Follett (Stevenage) (Lab): I know that my local primary care trust congratulates the Minister on his forward planning in this area. It is certainly aware of the need to provide extra GPs to meet the requirements of extra housing. However, it is worried about the effect that section two of the new GP contract—the provisions on payments for meeting quality targets—will have on its ability to fund GPs in the future. With that in mind, will my hon. Friend have another look at how the payments are funded?

Dr. Ladyman: The payments have been agreed and about 80 per cent. of GPs voted for the new contract. The financing of the specific provision in the contract is being fully resourced and an extra £1.8 billion is being provided from the centre to ensure that quality requirements can be met with the contract fully funded. The local primary care trust is predicting the challenges that it will face in the years ahead and ensuring that it can respond to them, and I am delighted that my hon. Friend accepts that such planning is being done appropriately.

Post Offices (Pensions and Benefits)

12.31 pm

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the procedures for collecting pensions and benefits from Post Offices.

The Bill would provide for a simpler process for opening a Post Office card account, prohibit pressure from being put on those who opt for such an account to switch to using a high street bank and ensure that all applicants clearly understand that an exceptions service is available.

These are times of great change not only in terms of the way in which our constituents receive their pensions and benefits, but for the Post Office, because the changes introduced by the Government have an impact on our post offices' economics and how they operate. Traditionally, our constituents have been able to use girobooks to collect their pensions and benefits from a post office, but the Government are withdrawing that system in favour of direct payment. The method of direct payment according to which people may go directly to a post office to access payments is the Post Office card account, which is a substitute for the girobook, but the Government are encouraging people to switch to using bank accounts, although they offer an exceptions service for those who cannot cope with either service.

The Government are forcing the pace of change because, as we know, people had the option to use their bank accounts prior to the Government's encouragement of that method, but they chose not to exercise it. We should respect the way in which our constituents wish to receive their pensions and benefits. We should understand that they have their own ways of budgeting and running their lives instead of forcing the pace of change for ministerial convenience. It is important to legislate on the matter to allow choice given the many other ways in which we have tried to persuade the Government to see the error of their ways and understand our constituents' need for genuine choice, rather than forcing choice on them.

There are consequences of a system that forces people to switch the way in which they handle their cash and finances from that with which they grew up. It is extremely dangerous for the Government to push people who are used to weekly budgeting with cash into using bank accounts against their wishes. Many people who currently collect cash from a post office have a bank account, but use it only for saving or to draw rainy-day amounts, rather than for day-to-day budgeting. If such people prematurely switch to receiving their pensions in their bank accounts, owing to the way in which the Department for Work and Pensions handles those people, and try to manage all their weekly budgeting through those accounts, they could get into any kind of muddle. That could lead to an overdraft, and they would thus be faced with letters from banks costing £20 or £30. A Post Office card account, however, cannot be overdrawn. It is a simple replacement for the girobook. People who use the account may still use their post offices and budget with cash.

The changes to the system also have consequences for our post offices—both rural and urban. The Government have had to recognise the additional pressures on rural post offices as they lose their traditional business of handling girobooks and they have had to come up with a subsidy of £150 million a year. That will continue until 2008 as an attempt to protect the rural post office network.

The Post Office has also had to undergo a major reorganisation of its urban branches. Only this week we have learned that Crown post offices are to face reorganisation. It is concerning to our constituents that the urban reinvention programme—the re-planning of the urban network of sub-post offices—went ahead without including the Crown reorganisation, as many will have assumed that, having lost their traditional urban post office, a Crown post office would provide the safety net.

For many communities, the post office is the last vital link with public services. It is the last meeting point and the last shop in many a rural village. People collecting their pensions also give such shops business. Using the post office sustains any other economic enterprise in the branch. The Government have promised that people will be able to continue to use their post office to collect pensions and benefits, but that will be a hollow promise if the post office is no longer there to use. It is therefore extremely important that we maintain the economic viability of post offices.

Primarily, my Bill aims to protect individuals. Following an inquiry last year by the Trade and Industry Committee into the way in which the Government handled the transition to direct payment, I am extremely worried about the way in which our constituents appear to be pressurised into switching to the use of bank accounts—the Government's preferred method—to receive their pensions or benefits. I seek to redress the balance.

The danger of switching to a bank account is not only that people might become overdrawn but the fact that many bank accounts cannot be accessed at a post office. HSBC, Halifax Bank of Scotland and the Royal Bank of Scotland group still have not provided a link to their current accounts through the Post Office. Therefore, encouraging the use of bank accounts—especially those I have just mentioned—automatically means that people can no longer use their post office. The Bill sets out a procedure to enable a neutral choice to be made.

The National Federation of Sub-Postmasters has highlighted such a choice in its 2004–05 manifesto. Hon. Members will find the document extremely useful in understanding the needs of our sub-postmasters and how best we can take forward a viable post office network. My Bill addresses the key part in the document on access to pensions and benefits in which the federation requests that the system be simplified. Currently, there are about eight steps to opening a Post Office card account. On receipt of a letter from the Government asking whether one wants to switch from the girobook, one has only to fill in one's bank details in order to use a bank account, but eight hurdles must be crossed in order to open a Post Office card account.

The claimant receives an invitation pack for direct payment from the Department for Work and Pensions. The claimant then has to phone the Department's euphemistically named customer conversion centre where, as many of our constituents will attest, they have to fight quite hard to insist on their right to a card account. The Department then sends the claimant a personal invitation document; the claimant takes the personal invitation document to the post office; the post office gives the claimant a card account application form; the claimant completes the application form and returns it to the sub-postmaster, who sends it to Post Office Ltd; Post Office Ltd then sends the claimant account details, a personal identification number and a pick-up notice for the claimant to pick up the card at the branch.

The Government slightly improved the service over the summer. The claimant used to have to fill in the account details from the Department's direct payment invitation pack, but at least the Government have short-circuited that last stage, and details can now be sent directly to the sub-post office, where the form will have already been filled in.

The federation suggests a far simpler system. When mailed at the end of the girobook system, the constituent is presented with a simple choice of whether to tick the box to say that they want to use an account at the post office, and to take the pre-completed form that has arrived at the same time to the local sub-post office to open an account. Alternatively, they can tick a box to indicate that they want to use a bank or building society account, in which case they may fill in a bank mandate. Thirdly and importantly, the federation suggests a third option of the exceptions service, under which someone may receive regular payments by girocheque through the post. It suggests that it should be made clear that if the constituent fails to respond, the latter option will automatically be enabled. Many constituents find the new system worrying and may well prefer to use the exceptions service.

It is vital to have a simple process for the future, because conversion applies not only to current claimants; all new claimants will have to consider their options and it is essential that they are aware that they can still use the Post Office and open a card account. There will be a clear statement in the Bill on the procedures to be followed for a DWP customer to open a card account. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have concerns about the pressure that is being put on people to switch to bank accounts and the Bill will state clearly that no pressure should be put on people using the service to switch from a Post Office card account. The Post Office should be driven by customer choice, not departmental convenience.

The House must exert its authority and insist that pensioners and those on benefits have a fair choice as to how they collect their cash in future. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir Robert Smith, Mr. Roger Berry, Malcolm Bruce, Richard Burden, Mr. Edward Davey, Mr. Nigel Evans, Kate Hoey, Mr. Lindsay Hoyle, Mr. John Randall, Mr. Alan Reid, Mr. Andrew Robathan and Mr. Peter Viggers.

POST OFFICES (PENSIONS AND BENEFITS)

Sir Robert Smith accordingly presented a Bill to amend the procedures for collecting pensions and benefits from Post Offices: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 19 November, and to be printed [Bill 170].

Children Bill [Lords] (Programme) (No.2)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the programme order of 13th September 2004 in relation to the Children Bill [Lords] be amended as follows—

1. Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the order shall be omitted.

2. The Proceedings shown in the first column of the following table shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the time specified in the second column.

TABLE

Proceedings	Time for conclusion of proceedings
Proceedings on New Clauses standing in the name of a Minister of the Crown and proceedings on New Clauses relating to Part 1.	2.30 p.m. on the day on which proceedings on Consideration are begun.
Proceedings on remaining New Clauses, other than New Clauses relating to the reasonable punishment of children.	4.15 p.m. on that day.
New Clauses relatinmg to the reasonable punishment of children and remaining proceedings on Consideration.	6.00 p.m. on that day.

3. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at 7 p.m. on the day on which proceedings on Consideration are begun.—[Margaret Hodge.]

12.42 pm

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): The Opposition do not want to hold up the Chamber's work this afternoon because we have a lot of business to get on with, which is why we cannot agree to this programme motion. We are about to discuss no fewer than 43 amendments and 16 new clauses; to tackle the important subject of new clause 2, which was completely emasculated in Committee, new developments on fostering, which have appeared since Committee, and serious outstanding problems on databases in clause 12; and we want to give a proper airing to parental access, and the whole subject, which we were fortunate enough to avoid in Committee, of smacking. The time allocated, as we have suggested all along, is really not sufficient to tackle these substantial issues. For that reason we cannot accept the programme motion.

Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): Liberal Democrats find the programme motion unacceptable because we have some important issues to consider and, unlike the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton), I do think that we need to discuss the issue of reasonable chastisement in great detail today. We would not seek to divide the House because we would prefer to spend the time on debate, but in the event of a Division we could not support the motion.

Question put:—

The House divided: Ayes 258, Noes 148.

Orders of the Day

Children Bill [Lords]

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 11

SHARING OF INFORMATION

'(1) The Assembly and the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service may provide any information to each other for the purposes of their respective functions under this Part and Part 1 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000 (c.43).

(2) A Welsh family proceedings officer and an officer of the Service (within the meaning given by section 11(3) of that Act) may provide any information to each other for the purposes of any of their respective functions.'.—[Mr. Touhig.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

12.57 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Amendment No. 5, in clause 25, page 19, line 39, at end insert—

'(g) Wales Joint Education Committee.'.

Amendment No. 6, in page 19, line 39, at end insert—

'(h) the governor of a prison or secure training centre in Wales (or in the case of a contracted out prison or secure training centre, its director).'.

Amendment No. 7, in clause 27, page 21, line 8, leave out from 'officer,' to ', for' in line 9.

Amendment No. 8, in page 21, line 11, leave out from 'members,' to ', to' in line 12.

Government amendment No. 40.

Amendment No. 33, in clause 65, page 42, line 36, at end insert

'but such an order must be made before the end of a period of nine months beginning with the day on which this Act is passed'.

Mr. Touhig: Given the way in which Bills are usually drafted and considered, it is unusual for a Minister who speaks about Welsh issues to be on his feet first on Report, particularly when some of the amendments are minor and technical. However, the Bill will benefit the children and young people of Wales, and I am delighted to open the debate.

Before turning to the first technical Government amendment, however, I should like briefly to reflect on the Bill's passage through both Houses of Parliament. The Bill was introduced in the other place, where it was well received and described as a small Bill with a big heart. Although almost 600 amendments were tabled, many of them were probing amendments and the Bill's core remains unchanged. It is testament to the thinking behind the Bill's central provision—to establish a commissioner to help improve the lot of children—that it has attracted general support in this House.

I pay tribute to the good work by members of Standing Committee B on the Bill. The debate was well informed and constructive, and the Government were able to respond positively on a number of areas—I am sure that the contributions to this afternoon's debate will be equally positive. A number of issues have followed the Bill through both Houses, and I have no doubt that they will be touched upon in the debate.

I shall discuss Government new clause 11 and Government amendment No. 40 now and respond to amendments moved by hon. Members afterwards. New clause 11 provides for the effective sharing of information between the Assembly and the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service—CAFCASS. Following the transfer of CAFCASS in Wales to the Assembly under part 4 of the Bill, it will be important for both to have a facility that will allow them to share information relating to individual cases. For example, there are likely to be cases involving children of families living on either side of the border who have separate family proceedings officers, both of whose tasks would benefit from sharing information about the two cases.

Similarly, a child made the subject of an order in Wales may at a later date move to England, so that if there are second proceedings in relation to that child, a different family proceedings officer will be appointed. Again, there will be considerable benefit from the Welsh family proceedings officer being able to share information about the first case with their counterpart in England. In addition, following the transfer, it will clearly be in the interests of both services for there to be ongoing liaison on good practice and management issues. Certainly, it would be desirable for CAFCASS and the Assembly to be able to share centrally held information concerned with organisational issues.

Government amendment No. 40 simply corrects a drafting error. As the Bill stands, clause 27(2)(a) requires a local health board to appoint a lead officer for children and young people's services for the purposes of the board's functions under the co-operation arrangements in clause 25 and the planning requirements in clause 26. The reference to clause 26 is incorrect. Although, under clause 25, the local health board would be involved in the planning consultation for children's services, the duty to prepare and publish a plan under clause 26 rests with the children's services authority. The amendment therefore restores the duties of a local health board under clause 27 to those originally intended.

I shall confine my remarks at this stage to the Government's proposals and respond appropriately when hon. Members have spoken to the other amendments.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): There is much in the Bill that Liberal Democrat Members can support, including the transfer of CAFCASS to Wales. However, the Minister will know that we have reservations about several issues, and we look to the Government to be more accommodating on those than they have been in the past.

I wish to speak to amendments Nos. 5 to 8, which stand in my name and in that of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole

[Mr. Roger Williams]

(Mrs. Brooke). Amendment No. 5 follows recommendations made in the Clywch inquiry into abuse in schools. In one case, a schoolteacher devised inappropriate drama activities as part of an examination curriculum whereby children were encouraged into activities that were, because of their sexual content, entirely inappropriate for their age and maturity. The examining board—the Welsh Joint Education Committee—provided examiners to go into the school to investigate the activities on its behalf and to evaluate them in terms of their dramatic merit in classifying pupils for exam results. Those examiners should have reported that something was going on in the school that was giving them great concern, but unfortunately they did not do so. As a result, some of the abuse and harm went on for much longer than was necessary.

Amendment No. 8 would therefore require that the Welsh Joint Education Committee be one of the partners that co-operates with the children's departments of local education authorities to ensure the welfare of children. In a plenary session of the Welsh Assembly, Jane Davidson, the Minister for Education and Lifelong Learning, said:

> "Jane Hutt and I have written to Charles Clarke proposing that examination boards be added to the list of bodies that the Bill requires to have regard for the need to safeguard and promote the welfare of children."

I hope that the Minister will take that on board. It is important that examination boards have a role to play, especially where practical activities are concerned.

Amendment No. 6 would require that governors of prisons or secure training units in Wales—or directors of contracted-out prisons or secure training units—also become partners in promoting the welfare of children and young people.

Amendments Nos. 7 and 8 are minor amendments that would give discretion to local authorities in naming the lead member or lead officer responsible for the functions in the Bill.

I should like the Minister to respond particularly to Amendment No. 5, which experience in Wales has led us to believe should be included in the Bill.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South) (Lab): I rise in support of new clause 2, which was tabled in the name of the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) and to which I am co-signatory, and amendment No. 34, which stands in my name. They are complementary. My amendment would remove the role of the children's commissioner for England from the Welsh equation—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is a little too early. I think that he is talking about the next group of amendments.

Mr. Jones: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: That is all right—we all make mistakes.

Mr. Touhig: I listened carefully to the points made by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams)—and by my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones), although I am sure that he will return to those a bit later.

Amendment No. 5, which stands in the names of the hon. Members for Mid-Dorset and North Poole and for Brecon and Radnorshire, proposes the inclusion of the Welsh Joint Education Committee—WJEC—in the list of partners in clause 25 who must co-operate with children's services authorities in Wales to improve the well-being of children in the area. The intention of clause 25 is that, taken with clause 26, it will provide a statutory basis for the work of the children and young people's framework partnerships in planning local services. It is difficult to see how the WJEC could be included with the clause 25 partners, because it is different in nature from the other bodies listed. It is a company limited by guarantee and owned jointly by the 22 local authorities in Wales. It has an office base in Cardiff but no regional or local presence in Wales, and it would be difficult to support its attendance at meetings of local partnerships. Its functions are highly specialised and narrow in comparison with the other bodies named as partners, which include the police, the probation service and health services. The National Council for Education and Training for Wales is included as a partner in recognition of the significant role that it plays as a local education and training provider.

I am of course aware of the criticisms of the WJEC by the Children's Commissioner for Wales in the Clywch inquiry report that he published a little while ago. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to his valuable work in carrying out that inquiry. I do not believe, however, that the amendment would adequately address his concerns. Apart from the inappropriateness of the WJEC being involved in 22 sets of local planning arrangements, many other awarding bodies operating within Wales would have to be brought into the equation. The vast majority are England and Wales awarding bodies, and the commissioner clearly had that wider field in mind when making his recommendation to my colleagues in the Assembly. He recommended that the Welsh Assembly, in partnership with the Department for Education and the Awdurdod Cymwysterau, Cwricwluwm ac Asesu Cymru—ACCAC—and the equivalent qualifications, curriculum and assessment authorities in Scotland, Northern Ireland and England consider the role of examining bodies across the UK with regard to child protection arrangements. The Government and the Assembly are committed to working together with the regulatory authorities in England and Wales to produce a practical response to the commissioner's recommendations, and we have established a steering group to take that work forward. I therefore hope that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire will concede that his amendment is a bit premature, because it is important that we have this wider consultation.

I have some difficulty with amendment No. 6 as well. The arrangements in clause 25 for promoting co-operation are focused mainly on children and young people who are permanently resident in the local authority area concerned. There would be little purpose in requiring a prison or secure training centre to take part in local arrangements with local agencies if few of the young people in its care were likely to come to their attention. However, clause 25(1)(c) places a duty on the children's services authorities to promote co-operation with which I hope will give some comfort to the hon. Gentleman. If the authority considers it appropriate for a prison governor or a director of a secure training centre to be involved in the co-operation arrangements, the authority must seek that involvement. The outcome will be a matter for local arrangement, and will depend on local circumstances. It would be inappropriate, and perhaps disproportionate, for such governors and directors automatically to be required to become involved in local co-operation arrangements.

"such persons or bodies as the authority consider appropriate",

In regard to amendments Nos. 7 and 8, there are a number of differences between the provisions for England and Wales in the Bill, which serve to build on the distinctive approach to developing services for children and young people that has been taken by my colleagues in the National Assembly. In Wales, no change is planned in the responsibility for service provision by requiring the appointment of a children's services director. There is no requirement for children's trusts. Instead, clause 27(1) requires each local authority to appoint a to co-ordinate and oversee co-operation arrangements to improve their well-being, and to designate a member for the same purpose. These lead directors and the lead members required to be designated will be responsible for taking forward arrangements for partnership planning to ensure that it acts as the strategic driver for action. I hope that, in the light of these assurances, the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues will feel able not to press their amendments to a vote.

We are somewhat confused about the intention behind amendment No. 33, tabled by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) and his hon. Friends. It might help if I explain the reason for the difference in commencement arrangements for clause 28 for the devolved and non-devolved bodies in Wales. The duty on agencies to ensure that their functions are discharged, having regard to the need to safeguard and promote the welfare of children, is placed on a range of agencies in Wales by clause 28, and in England by clause 11.

Tim Loughton: May I save the Minister some breath? This amendment would be more appropriately tabled in relation to the private fostering arrangements, but it has not been. On that basis, I was not proposing to move it, so I hope that I can save some of the Minister's time.

Mr. Touhig: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, which has saved us some time. I also hope that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire will feel able not to press the Liberal Democrats' amendments to a vote, and I urge the House to accept the Government's new clause 11 and Government amendment No. 40.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 17

PAYMENTS TO FOSTER PARENTS

'(1) The appropriate person may by order make provision as to the payments to be made—

(a) by a children's services authority in England or Wales or a person exercising functions on its behalf to a local authority foster parent with whom any child is placed by that authority or person under section 23(2)(a) of the Children Act 1989 (c.41);

(b) by a voluntary organisation to any person with whom any child is placed by that organisation under section 59(1)(a) of that Act.

(2) In subsection (1)—

"appropriate person" means—

(a) the Secretary of State, in relation to a children's services authority in England;

(b) the Assembly, in relation to a children's services authority in Wales;

"local authority foster parent" and "voluntary organisation" have the same meanings as in the Children Act 1989 (c.41).

(3) In section 23(2)(a) of the Children Act 1989 (c.41), at the end insert "(subject to section [payments to foster parents] of the Children Act 2004)".

(4) In section 59(1)(a) of that Act, at the end insert "(subject to section [payments to foster parents] of the Children Act 2004)".'.—[Margaret Hodge.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Margaret Hodge): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 10—National fostering allowance—

'The Government shall by regulations establish a national minimum fostering allowance payable by all children's services authorities in England.'.

Amendment No. 31, in clause 44, page 32, line 6, at end insert—

'(aa) the circumstances in which a person may be permitted to foster privately a child previously known to him without being registered;'.

Amendment No. 32, in page 34, line 29, leave out clause 46.

Government amendments Nos. 41 to 43.

Margaret Hodge: I know that Government new clause 17 and the consequential amendments standing in the name of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be welcomed by foster carers and by organisations such as the Fostering Network that promote foster care and work on behalf of foster carers. I intend to speak to the Government amendments and then respond to the amendments tabled by other hon. Members.

During our discussions on the Bill, strong arguments were advanced by foster carers and their organisations. We have listened to those arguments and are now in a position to respond positively to them. All hon. Members recognise the importance of foster carers, particularly in providing stability and a loving home for the most vulnerable children in our community—those who are looked after by the state. If we are to meet our objective of ensuring greater stability for more looked-after children, it is key that we try to recruit and retain more foster carers in the foster care work force. To do that, we need to put in place a range of measures.

1.15 pm

We have already achieved a lot, but I recognise that there is more for us to do. For instance, we are supporting local authorities in recruiting local foster carers in their local communities and we have prepared a pack for local authorities to use for that purpose. The recruitment of foster carers is most sensibly carried out locally and the job for the Government is to support local authorities in that task. We are also supporting the training of foster carers in the local community. For foster carers to feel valued and to feel that they have an important role to play, it is important that they receive continuous professional development and training, to give them a feeling that theirs is a proper profession.

We have also improved the tax and pensions position for foster carers, which has made a welcome change over the past few years. We are putting other measures in place, too. For example, we are developing a national telephone helpline for foster carers, and we hope to provide better support for foster carers who face allegations. We also want to celebrate excellence in foster carers through the introduction of a national award scheme.

For all that, we have had strong representations about what is perceived to be the unfairness resulting from the variability in the allowances paid to foster carers across the country. Those allowances do vary. I have looked at the Fostering Network's figures and seen variations from £60 to £250 in the costs awarded to foster carers for looking after an eight-year-old child. There are even variations within regions, which is difficult to explain. For example, in the north-west region, the allowance paid for looking after an eight-year-old varies from £60 to more than £200 per week.

The Government want to ensure that the allowances for foster carers fully meet the costs of caring for a looked-after child. We want to ensure greater transparency and consistency in the way in which local authorities calculate those allowances. That is why we are introducing the new clause and the amendments that go with it. Over the coming months, we will work closely with the local authorities and all the other stakeholders to come to a sensible view of how we should proceed on these issues.

We must all recognise that there will be variations in the cost for caring for a looked-after child. There will be variations according to the child's age, for example, and regional variations reflecting differences in housing costs up and down the country. There will be legitimate differences in the costs involved in looking after a looked-after child, depending on the complexity of the issues facing a particular child. We need to address what precisely the allowances should cover and decide what should legitimately be included in an allowance and what is perhaps less fair. We also need better to understand the relationship between allowances and the payments that some authorities give to foster carers for looking after children.

We want to examine other issues relating to payment over the coming months. For example, is there sufficient clarity in each local authority about entitlements? Do foster carers face difficulties when claiming one-off grants? Are there inefficiencies in various local authorities in regard to providing information or responding promptly to claims by foster carers?

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre) (Lab): My right hon. Friend rightly differentiates the remuneration of foster parents and payment for skills. Does she propose to introduce some national scale on which foster parents could be paid for the skills that they bring to their work?

Margaret Hodge: That is one of the many issues on which we want to consult local authorities and other stakeholders, including those organisations that represent foster carers, to make sure that we have a scheme that is workable and fair, and that enables us to recruit and keep more foster carers looking after children.

We already have resources available, about which some local authorities have expressed concern. For example, we have set aside £113 million over this spending review period under our "Choice Protects" programme, which puts a focus on fostering. If we consider the comprehensive spending review settlement, an extra £1 billion will be invested in children's services by the end of the period 2004–05 to 2007–08. We need to discuss local authorities' priorities with them.

I hope that the new clause and amendments are generally welcomed by the House. I look forward to working through the issues with all stakeholders, so that we can create fairness and equity and thereby support all the efforts that we all feel are important to build a stronger foster care work force.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): May I start uncharacteristically by congratulating the Minister and the Government on the new clause and corresponding amendments? We did not discuss foster carer payments in Committee. I have supported such payments, because we face a drastic problem. We spoke in Committee about foster carer registration schemes, which I shall deal with later in relation to our two amendments in this group.

The situation is dire and has got worse over the past year or so. It is now estimated that there are about 10,000 foster carer vacancies at a time when demand is certainly not lessening. There is great confusion about the amounts paid by varying local authorities to foster carers and no real benchmark for assessing whether local authorities are really paying the full cost. Figures produced by the Fostering Network show the enormous disparities, region by region, in relation to the percentage of local authorities paying below the minimum allowance: in the east midlands, 100 per cent. were below the minimum allowance, whereas in London, the figure was as low as 19 per cent. There is enormous confusion and variation in how fostering is remunerated up and down the country, which is one of the problems associated with the current shortage of foster carers. Perhaps more worrying is the way that we lose foster carers: the cost of training a foster carer is calculated as £12,000, so it is a false economy not to do everything that we can to keep good-quality foster carers in place once we have them.

I therefore welcome the fact that the Government have at last addressed this problem. There was a high-pressure campaign and many of us were e-mailed incessantly by foster carers all over the country calling for a new scheme for minimum allowances. Clearly, that work has paid off. But as the Minister said, much work still needs to be done to define how this scheme will operate in practice. I want to raise a few questions, most of which I am sure she will already be aware of. Perhaps she will give some initial responses as to the Government's current thinking, particularly in relation to how the scheme will be funded through local authorities.

The Deputy Prime Minister agreed at a Central Local Partnership conference of councillors two weeks ago that the Government would not impose additional burdens on local authorities if they were unfunded. That was a clear commitment given to the Local Government Association and local councillors. We therefore hope that it will be clear to local authorities how the scheme will be funded over the longer term. What reserve powers will the Minister have to invoke to put the scheme in place? When is it likely to be introduced? We hope that it is not just a wish list for several years hence. The Minister mentioned that £113 million is already allocated to "Choice Protects", much of which is targeted at the training of foster carers, and providing information to foster carers, but not at allowances. It does not therefore tackle directly the problem of proper funding of the scheme.

The Minister rightly referred to the problem of local authorities doing different things in different areas of the country. Certainly, variations for different costs of living up and down the country would be desirable. What discussions has she had with the LGA on putting that into effect? In a letter, the LGA stated:

> "It has the potential to cut across the ability of the local authority to develop different arrangements for paying allowances, expenses and other specific grants for costs such as holidays or school trips to foster carers. Taking account of local variables such as the age profile of looked after child population, or the regional variations in the cost of living are important in determining allowances locally."

I hope that all those considerations will be taken on board when the scheme is finalised.

The British Association for Adoption and Fostering has also raised questions, referring to

> "how the allowance will be calculated, the implementation date and whether a new ring-fenced grant will be made available to local authorities to ensure that this measure is funded."

It has launched a campaign to ensure that.

I welcome the Government amendments, but we want to see the beef, and we want to see it soon. We want to make sure that all those questions are being addressed, rather than have the Minister or her successor come back to the House in a few years' time still considering how the scheme will work.

That is only half the deal—we had some time in Committee to address the other half, which is the whole subject of a registration scheme. Extraordinarily, the Minister set her mind completely against that, despite the fact, to remind her, that every report that the Government have commissioned over the past five years confirms that privately fostered children are very vulnerable, and that a registration system involving the approval of private foster carers would protect their interests better than the current situation in which private foster carers are required only to notify local authorities about arrangements. I tackled her in Committee about how many people have fallen foul of the law as it currently stands. She was unable to answer that, largely because the number is tiny. The system is not working at the moment, and still too many people—we do not know the extent of it, because it is unquantifiable—are entering into private arrangements, particularly with vulnerable girls from west Africa who, as we know all too well, come into the country, disappear into the system and are open to all kinds of abuse and neglect, ending up in the sex industry or effectively as domestic slaves.

The Opposition still cannot understand why the Government have proved so inflexible on this issue. Their additions to the Bill do not address the problem—they are tokenism of the worst kind. Our amendments Nos. 31 and 32 therefore set down that the regulations must define > "the circumstances in which a person may be permitted to foster privately a child previously known to him without being registered".

In effect, we have attacked the problem from the other end, because the Minister was not responsive to setting up a registration scheme, with the question: when will private fostering be allowed, permissible and promoted by the Government if that arrangement is not registered? That is a different question to address the same problem, and I hope that the Government start to have the sort of conversion that they appear to have had on fostering allowances and become more open-minded on going the whole hog. I shall then be absolutely delighted to congratulate the Minister doubly, which is doubly unexpected from me.

That would help to give much more protection to a host of children whose fostering arrangements are inadequate and ensure that legitimate fosterers are properly remunerated, incentivised and trained. They will then be able to take on much more of the work load that we need them to take on, especially with difficult children, so that such children can be given a second chance of a stable upbringing rather than being condemned to the outer reaches of the system—far-flung children's homes where they are not best looked after—or condemned to failure in the sphere of education or health.

I congratulate the Minister on her new clause and amendments, but may I push her further? Now that she has opened the door, let us have all the beef and not just half of it.

1.30 pm

Mr. Dawson: I wholeheartedly welcome what my right hon. Friend the Minister has said. It marks excellent progress for not just foster carers but the entire care system. If we are to have a really effective system, we must ensure that foster carers are properly valued. That involves recompensing them for all the costs of looking after children and rewarding them for their skills. Those skills vary, but some carers operate very professionally, providing tremendously good care for some of the most vulnerable and disadvantaged children. All foster carers are doing an invaluable job: they are key partners in the system.

I am delighted that this good news has been welcomed by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton). Having managed a family placement team during the last eight miserable years of Conservative government before 1997, I can tell him that the rates paid to foster carers then were an absolute disgrace, and carers prevailed on me regularly to do something about it.

Tim Loughton: Can the hon. Gentleman confirm that those eight so-called miserable years were years in which there were rather more Labour councils than there are now, and that it was left to councils to pay the carers? It is entirely down to the hon. Gentleman's party that those years were so miserable.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): We were starved of resources.

Mr. Dawson: My hon. Friend was in a similar position. We were indeed starved of resources. Let us get real: the problem has been around for probably 50 years, but it was certainly much worse under the Tory Government. It has taken this Government to provide real resources and show real determination.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): The hon. Gentleman has a good deal of experience, but is there is not also a responsibility to ensure that local authorities have enough resources to support the foster carers whom we hope to recruit? Past failure has been due to a lack of resources at the centre to pay those taking on the task that the hon. Gentleman describes so eloquently.

Mr. Dawson: I agree. Thanks to "Choice Protects", at last some real investment—good money—is being spent on the training and ongoing support of foster carers, and we will see that that continues.

I am pleased that my right hon. Friend is going to consult. There are difficult issues to be teased out. They vary in different parts of the country and in different parts of the care system. What I would insist on is the development of good practice. I hope that we will not end up with a basic service providing the bare minimum. What foster carers want, need and deserve is quality—quality support, quality training and quality remuneration. They do not want to have to undergo endless bureaucratic processes just to identify the odd bit of money that they have paid on a child's behalf.

Looked-after children are the children of corporate parents, the local authorities. Those 60,000 looked-after children are our children. We owe it to them, via their foster carers, to treat them generously and give them all the life chances that every child should have the right to enjoy. That is our duty.

I will not say much about private fostering today. I voted against the Government on that in Committee, I disagree with the line that they are taking and I hope that they will quickly realise that the present notification scheme is completely inadequate. A registration scheme would be effective, simple and in the interests of privately fostered children, their parents and the fosterers. Today, however, we should celebrate the progress that is being made, and look forward to consultation and the involvement of all parties in making the care system much better than it has been in the past.

Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I too congratulate the Government. I am glad that we have embarked on this stage in a spirit of celebration. We all recognise the vital role of carers in giving some of the most disadvantaged children the opportunity of a stable family life and, indeed, other opportunities. We should value the wonderful people who offer those services, and show that we value them.

The Government's new clause and amendments make our new clause redundant. We are pleased about that, and pleased about the response to debate in the other place. I particularly appreciate the Minister's assurance that there will be more emphasis on training: I think that professionalisation is part of the valuing of the skills from which we are benefiting as a society and as corporate parent. What is clear is that we have failed looked-after children in many respects, and we can do much better.

I am glad that there is to be consultation in an attempt to agree on the details. It will be a difficult process, but it is the only way to deal with vast discrepancies for which it is hard to find any explanation. While acknowledging the complexities and the hard work involved, I would find it helpful if the Minister gave us an idea of the time scale. People need to know whether we are talking about six, 12 or 18 months.

I am afraid that local authorities in my part of the world pay less than the minimum, no doubt because of pressure on resources. We will need to be reassured that there will be new resources to cover this new measure. I do not think that referring to pots of money that are already accounted for is sufficient.

I, too, lament the fact that we did not manage to persuade the Government that private foster parents should be registered now rather than at some indefinite time in the future. I hope that we shall be able to return to that, although I accept that we debated it at length in Committee.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): I am sorry to disappoint hon. Members who may be looking for some dissent here but I too welcome the words of the Minister. I have long been in favour of establishing minimum fostering allowances. As a very young social worker in the mid-1970s, I found it extremely difficult to recruit foster parents, one of the reasons being that the rates were so insufficient. Only last year, I met with the fostering network in my constituency in Caernarfon, Gwynedd, and found the same concerns surfacing yet again, some 28 years later.

Foster parents are in short supply. Often they are out of pocket, and willingly so because they are committed to the work that they do. They play an invaluable role on behalf of us all. That should be recognised properly. The state should not be, by default, taking advantage of those people's commitment to their calling, and I am glad that the Minister will remedy that.

There is something of a postcode lottery in Wales, as the rates vary in the 22 local authorities. I will be glad to see the establishment of minimum rates, so that the rates paid do not depend on the local authority's ability to pay. I and the hon. Members who have contributed so far may have been reading the same brief. I think that the questions that have been raised already are important: how will the rates be calculated—I say "rates" because I assume that there will be a number—when will they be implemented and will local authorities be certain that a ring-fenced grant is available to ensure that the measure is properly funded?

Mr. Hancock: Like other hon. Members, I am delighted that we have this measure. It would be foolish of anyone here to doubt its necessity, or the pleasure that the whole House must have in seeing the new clause and indeed the Bill come into force. However, there are real issues.

I had 35 years' experience in local government of trying to recruit and encourage people to foster. It was not just the initial rate for the job that was a problem, but the failure of local authorities to support foster parents once in a position to take care of children. They always had to fight for the foster child's right to have the money to go on a school trip or to have the school uniform provided. Local authorities always saw foster care and fosterers as at the bottom end of social services' responsibilities. There was never great enthusiasm, mainly because too many social services directors thought that they knew best and held children's homes as a solution to the problem. It has taken a generation to change that.

I am delighted that the director of social services for Portsmouth city council, Mr. Rob Hutchinson, has been actively involved in much of the work that we are discussing. It is to his credit that he brings his reputation and the experience that he has gained both in Portsmouth and in Hampshire to bear on this matter, but the issues do not end there. Hon. Members are right to raise some doubts: the length of time it will take clearly to establish a minimum rate that will be universally acceptable and the need for flexibility on top of that, because it will still be difficult to recruit. In London, it will for ever be difficult to recruit foster parents. In some regions of the south-east, because of the economic climate, it will be difficult because it will be better for a family who need the resources to go elsewhere. Therefore, we must ensure that the judgment made on the minimum rate is right, and that local authorities have flexibility to allow extra payments to be made to take care of local needs. That must be a requirement.

On the point about local authorities ring-fencing not only the fostering element but their responsibilities towards fosterers, one cannot increase the number of fosterers if one does not increase the amount available to local authorities to manage, recruit, train and supervise what is happening properly. Too many local authorities will recruit as many fosterers as they can to take care of these vulnerable children in what they consider now to be the best way, yet not resource their central advisers to fosterers properly.

Sadly, private fostering has often come to the fore in my area. Local authorities face dilemmas in trying to deal with that, as do any of the authorities, such as the police, that may want to get involved but find it difficult to do so. I am at a loss to understand why the idea of a compulsory legally enforceable register for private fostering is not at the forefront of the Bill, because the real dangers are to those children.

Most children in local authority care will stand a reasonable chance of having their progress properly monitored and their futures clearly marked out for them but, in lots of instances, private fostering relationships are recipes for personal tragedies for the children. For that not to be recognised is a failure. Some way of having proper control over those arrangements and over the monitoring of those children is essential if we are to give them a fair chance in life. It is simply not good enough to suggest that what we have at the moment is satisfactory, because it manifestly is not.

That said, I welcome what has been said. I hope that the consultation is speedy, but I do not want it to neglect some of the real issues that need to be dealt with. Some of them may have to be dealt with by future legislation because I do not think that they can be remedied as easily as some of us may want.

Margaret Hodge: It is a delight to see such consensus not just across the Chamber, but on the Government Benches. I welcome that enormously. Perhaps we should stop our business now.

Hon. Members have raised perfectly legitimate issues and demonstrated some of the complexity of the detail that we need to deal with as we take forward our intent to set a national foster care allowances system in process. The letter that was sent by the Association of Directors of Social Services said:

> "The devil is very much likely to be in the detail. The ADSS would expect that should the Bill be so amended"

as we are doing today

> "there would be detailed discussions about a staged implementation between the Government and local government."

It is because of the complexity of the issues and because we want to take our partners with us—the people on the front line who will have to implement the national scheme—that we are looking at a staged implementation. To help hon. Members, I will tell them what our thinking is, although it is early days.

We want to spend the early part of 2005 in extensive consultation with all interested partners. We hope at the end of that process to be able to set the rates and to publicise them. We hope that that in itself will move things forward and that a number of authorities will improve their rates after we have taken them through the discussion on what is a fair rate for looking after a child. During 2006, we hope to work with local authorities in implementing the rates, as set in 2005. We will then, probably at the beginning of 2007, invoke the power, should that be necessary, if local authorities are not complying with the rates that have been agreed with them. I hope that that gives hon. Members some clarity about the timetable.

[Margaret Hodge]

On costs, I accept the commitment given by the Government that were we to impose additional burdens, we would provide the necessary funding but I hope hon. Members will agree that looked-after children have to be placed. There is a legislative imperative to do so. If we do not have sufficient foster carers, particularly in the local community, an on-the-spot decision tends to be taken. Often, the looked-after children are placed in extremely expensive residential accommodation out of the borough. My officials and I will need some convincing during our discussions that setting an appropriate and proper minimum foster care allowance will constitute an additional expense. It could lead to a change in the way in which we spend money, and to an expenditure saving that we could then reinvest in other services that support foster carers or looked-after children. We will keep this issue at the forefront of our minds, but we do not necessarily agree that such an allowance will lead to an increase in expenditure on looked-after children in whom local authorities already invest money.

I do not want to suggest, as I had to do in Committee, that on these issues we are the libertarians and the Opposition are the Stalinists. However, we will not consider using a ring-fenced grant as a mechanism for implementing a minimum foster care system. We will have discussions with the Local Government Association, the Association of Directors of Social Services, and the various voluntary organisations that represent foster carers. We want, in that partnership environment, to work through what are very complex issues and to establish a workable system.

Tim Loughton: I do not wish to appear too Stalinist, but is the Minister saying that there will be a saving, which I agree there will be? As we discussed in Committee, we are talking about private children's homes that cost £2,000 a week upwards compared with foster carers who cost several hundred pounds, but surely there has to be a lead-in process. Will the Minister make sure that the money is available for local authorities to ensure that foster carers are trained and in place—doing so will indeed cost money—even if the savings will come a few years down the line, when we will no longer have to rely so much on out-of-area placements?

Margaret Hodge: That is just the sort of detailed conversation that we need to engage in with our partners. It was in the light of such issues that I alluded to the "Choice Protects" grant and to the additional resources that we are putting into children's services during the comprehensive spending review period.

Jonathan Shaw: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is very easy simply to say that we will reduce the number of out-of-borough placements to the private sector? In fact, we need all these services, including specialist residential provision, so it is not a case of having one or the other. It is essential that we have such provision, and that it has the capacity to develop services for the most damaged children.

Margaret Hodge: I agree with my hon. Friend and I certainly respect his experience, which was gained during many years on the front line as a social worker. But equally, I hope that he agrees with me that it is in the interests of more looked-after children to provide them with the stability of a placement in a loving home with a foster carer. Whatever the shortages, if we can increase the number of such carers—we need to establish a far better basis for doing so than currently exists—using the creation of a national foster allowance system as one mechanism for doing so, that will improve the lives of looked-after children for whom such an environment is appropriate. Over time, that should lead to some savings for local authorities that currently do not commission in a particularly rational way the places that they require for such children.

Given that Members want to speak about other issues, I shall deal briefly with the registration of private foster care. I agree with the House that this is a very important issue that we need to get right, which is why we have secured the relevant power through what is known as a sunset clause. As a result, if we cannot improve the current notification scheme, we can move immediately to a registration scheme without needing to return to the House to obtain primary legislation. The whole House agrees, as do I, that the current notification scheme is not working and is inadequate. But I hope that in the light of the additional powers that we are taking—powers to insist that awareness of the scheme be promoted, and that local authorities monitor their own notification schemes—Members will agree that it is worth allowing time to see whether the system works. With the best will in the world, even a registration scheme might not provide the safeguards and protection that we all seek for such children, who are sometimes the most vulnerable in our communities.

Jonathan Shaw: My right hon. Friend knows my views on this matter. What criteria does she envisage the Department using to assess whether her proposed scheme is successful, particularly given that the number of private foster carers is not known because the figures are not collated?

Margaret Hodge: This is a difficult issue, but those authorities that are making huge efforts to ensure that the notification scheme works have a far greater number of notifications than those that, in my view, are not making adequate efforts. So monitoring the number of notifications will be just one of the mechanisms that we will use. However, my hon. Friend is right to draw our attention to this issue. We do need to get a better handle on the quantum of the problem, and to focus on the most vulnerable among the broad group of children who come under private fostering arrangements.

I warmly thank Members for their welcome for the new clause. Rather than dividing on this issue I hope that we will unify, so that we can ensure that foster carers are rewarded properly, that they are not out of pocket in caring for looked-after children, and that we grow the foster care work force.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

CHILDREN'S COMMISSIONER: FUNCTIONS

'(1) The Children's Commissioner has, subject to the following provisions of this Part, the function of promoting and safeguarding the rights and interests of children in England.

(2) The Children's Commissioner may in particular under this section—

(a) encourage persons exercising functions or engaged in activities affecting children to take account of their rights, views and interests;

(b) advise the Secretary of State on the rights, views and interests of children;

(c) review and report on the effectiveness of—
  (i) advice and advocacy services;
  (ii) complaints procedures; and
  (iii) inspection and whistle-blowing arrangements,

so far as relating to children;

(d) review and report on any other matter relating to the rights, views and interests of children.

(3) The Children's Commissioner must take reasonable steps to involve children in the discharge of his functions under this section, and in particular to—

(a) ensure that children are made aware of his function and how they may communicate with him;

(b) consult children, and organisations working with children, on the matters he proposes to review and report on under subsection (2)(c) or (d);

(c) ensure that the content of any material issued by the Commissioner or his staff, whether printed or in electronic or other form, which is intended to be used by children, takes account, so far as practicable, of the means of communication, level of understanding and usual language of the intended recipients.

(4) The Children's Commissioner must for the purposes of subsection (3) have particular regard to groups of children who do not have other adequate means by which they can make their views known.

(5) The Children's Commissioner or a person authorised by him may for the purposes of his function under this section at any reasonable time—

(a) enter any premises, other than a private dwelling, for the purposes of interviewing any child accommodated or cared for there; and

(b) if the child consents, interview the child in private.

(6) Any person exercising functions under any enactment must supply the Children's Commissioner with such information in that person's possession relating to those functions as the Children's Commissioner may reasonably request for the purposes of his function under this section (provided that the information is information which that person may, apart from this subsection, lawfully disclose to him).

(7) The Children's Commissioner may provide assistance to a child to bring legal proceedings where the child is unable to bring legal proceedings; and it appears to the Commissioner reasonable to do so and there is no other person or body likely to provide such assistance or take such action (or both).

(8) In considering for the purpose of his function under this section what constitutes the rights and interests of children (generally or so far as relating to a particular matter) the Children's Commissioner must have regard to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

(9) In subsection (8) the reference to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child is to the Convention on the Rights of the Child adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 20th November 1989, subject to any reservations, objections or interpretative declarations by the United Kingdom for the time being in force.'.—[Mrs. Brooke.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mrs. Brooke: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 2—Powers of consideration and representation by Children's Commissioner for Wales—

'(1) Section 75A of the Care Standards Act 2000 (c.14) (additional powers of consideration and representation) is amended as follows.

(2) Omit subsections (1) and (2) and insert—

"The Commissioner may consider, and make representations about, any matter affecting the rights and welfare of children in Wales to—

(a) the Assembly, and

(b) where the matter is not devolved and the Commissioner considers it appropriate, to the responsible United Kingdom Minister of the Crown or Government department.".'.

New clause 3—Requirement to review working of Part 1 of the Act—

'(1) The Children's Commissioner shall—

(a) keep under review the working of Part 1 of this Act and in doing so consult with children and representatives of organisations concerned with children's rights and interests;

(b) make reports on it to the Secretary of State in accordance with the following provisions of this section.

(2) The first report under this section shall be made as soon as is practicable after the third anniversary of the coming into force of this Part.

(3) A subsequent report under this section shall be made at such time as the Children's Commissioner thinks fit, not being earlier than three years after the making of the last previous report.

(4) A report under this section—

(a) shall include the views of the Children's Commissioner on the adequacy and effectiveness of this Part; and

(b) may contain recommendations as to amendments to this Part which in the opinion of the Children's Commissioner are necessary or desirable.

(5) The Secretary of State shall as soon as is reasonably practicable lay a copy of every report sent to him under this section before each House of Parliament.'.

New clause 13—Children's Commissioner: functions (No.2)—

'(1) The Children's Commissioner has, subject to the following provisions of this Part, the function of promoting and safeguarding the rights and interests of children in England.

(2) The Children's Commissioner may in particular under this section—

(a) encourage persons exercising functions or engaged in activities affecting children to take account of their rights, views and interests;

(b) advise the Secretary of State on the rights, views and interests of children;

(c) review and report on the effectiveness of—
  (i) advice and advocacy services;
  (ii) complaints procedures; and
  (iii) inspection and whistle-blowing arrangements,

so far as relating to children;

(d) review and report on any other matter relating to the rights, views and interests of children.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

(3) The Children's Commissioner must take reasonable steps to involve children in the discharge of his functions under this section, and in particular to—

- (a) ensure that children are made aware of his function and how they may communicate with him;
- (b) consult children, and organisations working with children, on the matters he proposes to review and report on under subsection (2)(c) or (d);
- (c) ensure that the content of any material issued by the Commissioner or his staff, whether printed or in electronic or other form, which is intended to be used by children, takes account, so far as practicable, of the means of communication, level of understanding and usual language of the intended recipients.

(4) The Children's Commissioner must for the purposes of subsection (3) have particular regard to groups of children who do not have other adequate means by which they can made their views known.

(5) The Children's Commissioner or a person authorised by him may for the purposes of his function under this section at any reasonable time—

- (a) enter any premises, other than a private dwelling, for the purposes of interviewing any child accommodated or cared for there; and
- (b) if the child consents, interview the child in private.

(6) Any person exercising functions under any enactment must supply the Children's Commissioner with such information in that person's possession relating to those functions as the Children's Commissioner may reasonably request for the purposes of his function under this section (provided that the information is information which that person may, apart from this subsection, lawfully disclose to him).

(7) In considering for the purpose of his function under this section what constitutes the rights and interests of children (generally or so far as relating to a particular matter) the Children's Commissioner must have regard to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

(8) In subsection (7) the reference to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child is to the Convention on the Rights of the Child adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 20th November 1989, subject to any reservations, objections or interpretative declarations by the United Kingdom for the time being in force.'.

New clause 18—Exercise of functions in relation to children in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland—

'(1) It shall be the sole responsibility of the Children's Commissioner for Wales to—

- (a) hold an inquiry on any matters as regards children in Wales; and
- (b) consider, and make appropriate representations about, any matter affecting children ordinarily resident in Wales.

(2) It shall be the sole responsibility of the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Scotland to—

- (a) hold an inquiry on any matters as regards children in Scotland; and
- (b) consider, and make appropriate representations about, any matter affecting children ordinarily resident in Scotland.

(3) It shall be the sole responsibility of the Commissioner for Children and Young People in Northern Ireland to—

- (a) hold an inquiry on any matters as regards children in Northern Ireland; and
- (b) consider, and make appropriate representations about, any matter affecting children ordinarily resident in Northern Ireland.'.

Amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 6, leave out clause 2.

Amendment No. 11, in clause 2, page 2, line 18, leave out 'take reasonable steps to'.

Amendment No. 12, in clause 2, page 2, line 19, leave out 'section' and insert 'Part'.

Amendment No. 44, in clause 4, page 2, line 24, at end insert—

'(c) ensure that direct services provided to children by the Commissioner or his staff in Wales whether formally or informally are provided in Welsh or English or both according to the wishes of the intended recipients.'.

Amendment No. 13, in clause 2, page 2, line 31, at end insert—

'(6A) In carrying out his functions under this section the Commissioner must take steps to ascertain the views of parents and other persons caring for children in improving the well-being of children.'.

Amendment No. 4, in page 4, line 1, leave out clause 4.

Amendment No. 34, in page 4, line 24, leave out clause 5.

Amendment No. 45, in page 4, line 24, leave out clauses 5 to 7.

Amendment No. 24, in clause 5, page 4, line 29, leave out '(12) of section 2' and insert—

'(9) of section [Children's Commissioner: functions]'.

Amendment No. 25, in clause 6, page 5, line 6, leave out '(12) of section 2' and insert—

'(9) of section [Children's Commissioner: functions]'.

Government amendment No. 28.

Amendment No. 26, in clause 7, page 5, line 38, leave out '(12) of section 2' and insert—

'(9) of section [Children's Commissioner: functions]'.

Amendment No. 27, in clause 9, page 7, line 7, leave out '2(11) and (12)' and insert—

'Children's Commissioner: functions and (9)'.

Government amendment No. 30.

Amendment No. 9, in schedule 1, page 44, line 19, at end insert—

'(1A) The Secretary of State must take reasonable steps to involve children and representatives of children's organisations in the process of appointment of the Commissioner.'.

Amendment No. 10, in schedule 1, page 45, line 31, leave out

'and on such conditions (if any).'.

Mrs. Brooke: I think that the consensus has come to an end. I rise to speak to new clause 1 and amendment No. 1, which would delete clause 2, as amended in Committee, to consequential amendments Nos. 24 to 27, and to amendment No. 4, which would leave out clause 4. My hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) very much hopes to speak to new clause 2, and on other issues pertaining particularly to Wales. As we are short of time, it might help if I said at the outset that we want to press new clauses 1 and 2 to a vote.

The Minister will be aware that a wide range of organisations and individuals are enormously disappointed with the amendments to clause 2 that were recently passed in Committee. During the debate, it became apparent that the Government's views on the functions and role of the children's commissioner were fundamentally different from those who opposed the amendments, with little hope of convergence. Given the widespread welcome for a Children's Commissioner for England—I do indeed welcome the concept—it is surely right that we revisit the issues and reflect on the cross-party support given in the other place to a clause similar to new clause 1. Indeed, new clause 1 is also very similar to new clause 13, as proposed by the Conservatives.

As a consequence of the Government's amendments, the children's commissioner now has the function of "promoting awareness of the views and interests of children".

That contrasts with the much stronger statement resulting from cross-party amendments made in the other place, which would have given the commissioner the function of "promoting and safeguarding the rights and interests" of children. As the Children's Commissioner for Wales said:

> "What sort of 'champion' is it that does not advocate for the rights of the group of people they are championing?"

We welcome the fact that the Government accepted at a very early stage an amendment in the other place whereby the commissioner "must"—rather than "may"—have regard to the United Nations convention on the rights of the child. But the Government also required that the commissioner be concerned "in particular" with the five "outcome goals". The Joint Committee on Human Rights concluded:

> "We consider that the confusion engendered by reincorporating in the Bill a duty to have regard both to the Convention and the five outcomes will risk downgrading the Convention from a framework to a background to the Commissioner's work . . . We conclude that it is unnecessary for the five outcomes listed in clause 2(3) as originally introduced to be reinstated. If the Government feels they must, they should be clearly placed within the context of the CRC."

The Minister told the Committee that if the focus were simply on rights, it would limit the work that the commissioner could do on behalf of children. That is a point with which we have considerable difficulty.

2 pm

There is nothing narrow about the proposed focus on rights and interests. The convention on the rights of the child covers all aspects of childhood and we ratified that convention in 1991. It gives all babies and children a comprehensive set of economic, social, cultural, civil and political rights, 40 in all. Because of constraints on time, I shall not run through them all, but they cover education, health, sexual exploitation, adoption, children in trouble with the law and so forth. The convention provides a wide framework for the children's commissioner and it is not limiting in the way the Minister suggested. It is, indeed, a foundation on which everything else can be built.

We oppose clause 4 because it gives the Secretary of State the power to direct the commissioner to undertake an inquiry. The Government have given assurances that they foresee the power being used only in cases of extreme significance. However, the Secretary of State can already convene such an inquiry under existing powers.

Ms Debra Shipley (Stourbridge) (Lab): Does the hon. Lady recall that, in Committee, the Minister for Children argued in favour of the Secretary of State having powers to direct? Does she agree that that is totally wrong and that the Secretary of State should not have such powers? The Secretary of State can already instigate inquiries and it is vital that the children's commissioner be independent of Government and free to comment on Government inquiries. Can the hon. Lady envisage circumstances in which a Government inquiry could have a specific political dimension, making the independence of the children's commissioner absolutely vital?

Mrs. Brooke: I thank the hon. Lady for her intervention and I could not agree more with her, so I will cut a bit out of my speech. It is indeed vital that we have a genuinely independent children's champion.

In Committee, the Minister said that the changes that she was proposing would > "ensure that we have the very best commissioner in the world, built on our experience of the workings of commissioners in other countries."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 12 October 2004; c. 16.]

All members of the Committee wanted the best commissioner in the world, but which other commissioner anywhere does not have the basic right and duty of promoting and safeguarding children's rights? None. The model proposed for our commissioner is far weaker than those that exist in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. I understand that the European Network of Ombudspersons for Children has written to the Minister expressing concern at the weakness of the legislation, suggesting that the Children's Commissioner for England might not be able to join the network. In other words, we cannot be part of the club.

On Second Reading in the other place, my noble friend Baroness Walmsley said:

> "I was horrified to discover that the budget per child for the Northern Ireland Commissioner is £3.80, for every Welsh child it is £2.11, every Scottish child 98p, but the anticipated expenditure on every English child is only 24p"—[Official Report, House of Lords, 30 March 2004; Vol. 659, c. 1220.]

Suspicion remains that the limiting of the role of the English commissioner is financial. I believe that that is quite fundamental.

Briefly, we welcome Govt amendment No. 30—the Government were listening there—and also have considerable sympathy for new clause 3. I am mindful that many other hon. Members have important contributions to make, so I shall end there.

Mr. Martyn Jones: I rise this time, I hope, to speak to the correct group of amendments. It all shows how keen I am to get my views on the record. [HON. MEMBERS: "Excellent."] I support, as do other members of the Committee, the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke). We are co-signatories in respect of her new clause and of mine; they are complementary.

My amending provision is designed totally to remove the role of the Children's Commissioner for England out of the Welsh equation. At the same time the other extends the role of the Children's Commissioner for Wales to fill the gap and provide a comprehensive service to children from Wales wherever they are in care or in need of care. Sadly, the Government have refused to deal with that matter to the satisfaction of the Committee, of non-governmental organisations across Wales and of the Children's Commissioner for Wales himself.

The Government say that they do not want to extend devolution on this matter, but extending powers at this stage would not affect the current devolution settlement one iota. Acceptance of the amendment would not give a single additional power to the National Assembly for Wales, but would allow the Children's Commissioner for Wales to carry out his duties properly and to help Welsh children in all aspects of their lives, wherever they are in the UK.

I cannot emphasise enough to the House that the Children's Commissioner for Wales is an independent body and not a National Assembly body and neither is the commissioner's role to be an adjunct to the Welsh Assembly Government. He stands alone and should not be mixed up in the devolution process, as the Government seem to fear is likely to happen.

Members of the Welsh Affairs Committee have rehearsed the arguments on many occasions over this specific point. Indeed, the Committee conducted a report, "The Powers of the Children's Commissioner for Wales", and we took evidence from the Minister for Children herself. The amendments advocate a logical and sensible move for the children of Wales, and I can assure the House that everyone in Wales agrees with what they propose. I would not have added my name to the amendments and new clauses if I were swimming against the tide of Welsh opinion. Children's organisations and the National Assembly for Wales believe that this is the right move for Welsh children and that the Government are wrong on this specific issue. I am sure that the Minister would agree that the acid test is how legislation operates in practice.

Mr. Touhig: I congratulate the Committee on its excellent work, as reflected in the report, but is my hon. Friend aware that, in his annual report, the Children's Commissioner for Wales made it plain that he was able to make representations to the Government on any matter affecting children in Wales? It works.

Mr. Jones: I have no doubt that he will attempt to make it work, but I also know from the evidence that he gave to the Committee—my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is being selective—that he does not accept that the drafting of the legislation would make his job any easier. In fact, he said that it would make it more difficult.

Mr. Martin Caton (Gower) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the debate shows that we are not asking the Government to move very far? We are asking only to formalise and make proper an arrangement that already exists informally. The point is that the Children's Commissioner for Wales is not a creature of the Assembly—it is completely independent—so the huge constitutional crisis that Ministers seem to fear will not arise.

Mr. Jones: Indeed. There is no crisis. The Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service has already been devolved to the Assembly. We are talking about something that is far less of a move than that. I simply cannot understand why the Government are so intransigent on this matter. I know that the Minister wants what is best for children in Wales, so she should listen more to what the NGOs and charities in Wales are saying; they want the same thing.

I am a huge supporter of the concept of draft legislation, but if the Government want Select Committees to undertake detailed pre-legislative scrutiny, they will have to accept that they should listen on occasions to what those Committees say. This is one such occasion and I ask the Government to accept the amendments in order to make a good and well-intentioned Bill even better.

Tim Loughton: The consensus is well and truly over at this stage, and the great melange of amendments and new clauses in the group covers a wide range of subjects about the children's commissioner. I shall speak briefly to new clause 1, proposed by the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke), which we shall support. It is similar to our new clause 13.

In Committee debates about the children's commissioner, we applied five principles. First, the new children's commissioner should be independent of the Government and a champion for children. Secondly, the commissioner should be powerful enough to do his or her job properly, regardless of Government schemes and funding shortfalls. Thirdly, he should fully engage with children and young people and also gain their confidence, as Baroness Ashton said in the other place. Fourthly, the children's commissioner should have a clear status in the context of other UK commissioners and other agencies and interested parties. Fifthly, the commissioner should be accountable to all of the above.

I fear that the way in which the Government have emasculated the powers of the commissioner has spoiled the cross-party consensus. I see the Minister for Children responding with an enormous Cheshire cat grin on her face as though she has just killed the biggest rat of all. There was enormous cross-party consensus to put together a comprehensive new clause 2 in the Lords. She has completely torn the guts out of it.

Let us remind ourselves of what the Government have reversed. They have completely left out the mention of children's rights. Instead, the children's commissioner will be promoting awareness of children's views. Children have no rights in the Bill; it is rights-lite, rights-free. In Committee, I offered the Minister the comparison of considering how feeble the Disability Rights Commission would appear if its general function were simply to promote awareness of the views of disabled people. The same would be true of the Commission for Racial Equality or the Equal Opportunities Commission.

The Minister made a series of amendments rather than just replacing new clause 2, and I have never been sure why she did that. The Bill dilutes the review and reporting powers, removing the advocacy and whistleblowing arrangements. It declines to beef up the children's commissioner's obligations to make children aware that they can consult him, and restores the Government's limited checklist on what sort of children's views and interests—not rights—he can take notice of. It reinforces the commissioner's inability to undertake inquiries into individual cases, even when they have implications for children generally. That is why the original clause, to which the Government have reverted, was described in the upper Chamber as discriminatory and castrated and as giving the children's commissioner the powers of a glorified public relations consultant. All along, the Government have claimed that they have done what children wanted, but nowhere have they provided evidence of that.

Five references to children's rights have been removed. The provision to support individual children was removed. The references to reviewing and reporting on the effectiveness of advice and advocacy and on whistleblowing and inspection arrangements were removed. The Government reinserted their outcome goals in part 1 of the Bill.

The Minister said that, in Committee, Ministers stated that the Government would ensure that they had the best commissioner in the world, built on their experience of the workings of commissioners in other countries. The Children's Rights Alliance has been completely unable to find a commissioner anywhere who does not have the basic duty of promoting and safeguarding children's rights, which means, by the looks of things, that the Children's Commissioner for England will not be permitted to be part of the European network.

We want to restore the original clause 2 that was inserted in the Bill in the upper House, as it has been emasculated. We will support new clause 1 in endeavouring to do that, although we think that new clause 13, removing subsection (7)—about which we, and the Government, have some qualms—would be the best way to do that.

Amendments Nos. 11 and 12 are all about involving children, which is what the Bill is supposed to be all about. Amendment No. 11 would take the short phrase "take reasonable steps" from subsection (4) so that the children's commissioner must involve children in the discharge of his functions. That is what we have assumed all the way along, so why must "reasonable steps" be placed in the way of the commissioner's doing that?

In the first schedule to the Bill, we want to involve children much more in the selection of the children's commissioner in the first place. Amendment No. 9 says that the appointment of the commissioner should involve children and children's organisations. Consider the status of the other children's commissioners. In Wales, the appointment is made by the First Secretary of the National Assembly after taking account of the advice of the relevant committee, the views of relevant children and the advice of a selection panel independent of the Assembly. In Northern Ireland, the commissioner is appointed by the First Minister and Deputy First Minister jointly, independently of the Government. In Scotland, the commissioner is appointed by the Queen on the nomination of the Scottish Parliament. But in England, he will be appointed by the Secretary of State. That is very different from the arrangements that pertain in the rest of the United Kingdom, which is why the English commissioner is not going to be the best in the world. In a phrase often quoted in the House of Lords, it is all about big ears and no teeth.

2.15 pm

Among the other amendments, one originally tabled by Lord Northbourne places in the Bill a necessity for the children's commissioner to take into account the views of parents and carers when dealing with children. Parents have a very special status, the most special status. The Government trotted out the usual routine about it being iniquitous to specify one set of people or organisations, but we think that that is tosh when it applies to parents, who clearly have a special status, hence amendment No. 13.

The Government have dealt disgracefully with all the hard work that went into putting together a comprehensive new clause 2 that had support across the upper House and has support on all Benches in this House, other than the Government Front Bench. That work was about making the children's commissioner a real children's champion who would stand up to represent children and be a part of their lobbies. The Government have taken away all those additional powers that would have made the Children's Commissioner for England the most powerful and impressive of all, and that is a missed opportunity.

I shall not refer at length to concerns about the Welsh dimension. I share them, and we tabled amendments on that in Committee. There will be enormous confusion over the relationship between the English commissioner and those of the other three nations of the United Kingdom. Given that we have devolution, let us have a system under which the four commissioners can talk to each other equally without treading on each other's toes, as will invariably happen. We foresee great problems in the future, which is a pity. This is a missed opportunity, and I ask the House to support new clause 1.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I speak in support of amendment No. 34, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones), and new clause 1.

We discussed issues relating to Wales at length in Standing Committee and in the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs. We have taken a lot of evidence, as my hon. Friend, who chairs the Committee, has said. The Government should listen to the Welsh Affairs Committee, whose views have been totally ignored. It is shameful that the Government have not taken more notice of what we have said.

The Government should also have taken more notice of the first children's commissioner to be set up in the United Kingdom, Peter Clarke, who has been in post for three years now. They did not even consult him about the shape and form of the new Children's Commissioner for England. That was a terrible failing. This is a good Bill and it is sad that issues remain that could have been sorted out. There is much to rejoice in, including today's good news from the Government, but it is sad that we have had to raise the Welsh dimension again today.

The overwhelming view in Wales is that the Government's proposals in clause 5, which amendment No. 34 aims to delete, would undermine the Children's Commissioner for Wales and be confusing to children in Wales. The Northern Ireland and Scotland commissioners also find the proposals undermining.

Clarity and simplicity seem to be the keys to any successful office. The Children's Commissioner for Wales has had a big impact and made a lot of difference to consideration of children and their rights. The Government have not consulted him or listened to him. What is happening is undermining him. Their proposals are a setback for Wales.

The Children's Commissioner for Wales already has the power to listen to any concerns raised by children. He has been into prisons to see children and he has related his findings to the police and worked hard on such non-devolved matters. Clause 5 gives the English children's commissioner the function of promoting awareness in Wales about non-devolved matters, without any proposal for him to have even a base in Wales.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that the president of the European Network of Ombudspersons for Children recently wrote to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children emphasising that, under the job description that has been given, it is unlikely that the commissioner would be able to join the network. Not only is the commissioner in England likely to be a watered-down version of the commissioners already in place in the other UK nations, but the protection afforded would compare badly with what is offered by counterparts in Europe. I do not believe that English children are uniquely undeserving of a real commissioner.

Julie Morgan: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention, and I support what she says.

The English children's commissioner will operate without knowledge of the Welsh context or of the interface between devolved and non-devolved matters. Peter Clarke and the children's commissioners for Scotland and for Northern Ireland have condemned the proposed model and said that it is a recipe for confusion. Peter Clarke said that if he visited secure accommodation in Neath and saw two children, he would be responsible for the one who had come in through the care system but not for the other if that child had come in through the juvenile justice system, because the latter child would come under the remit of the English children's commissioner.

That is bound to cause problems and difficulties. Our duty is to children in Wales, and we must ensure that those who have problems are clear about where they should take them. It is very sad that we have been unable to come to an arrangement that is satisfactory to everyone in Wales.

Clause 5 also allows the English Secretary of State to direct the English children's commissioner to undertake inquiries in Wales. That means that an English Minister can ask the English children's commissioner to conduct an inquiry, in Wales, into a case involving a Welsh child. That is a recipe for confusion, and it calls into question the independence of the Children's Commissioner for Wales. I do not see how a person who can be directed by a Secretary of State can be called "independent".

The Government are pinning their hopes on the commissioners being able to liaise with each other by means of a memorandum of understanding. This House should be giving out the clear message that the arrangements that we are making will best serve the interests of children in Wales. I am sorry that the Government have not listened to the Welsh Affairs Committee, the Children's Commissioner for Wales or to children's organisations in Wales, because it means that they have not listened to those who work most closely with children in Wales.

The Welsh Affairs Committee produced an excellent report on this matter, but the Government's response was very disappointing. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will tell the House what she intends to do to tackle those problems.

Margaret Hodge: I want to begin by assuring all hon. Members that the Government have listened to other opinions, throughout this debate and in connection with every clause in the Bill. The range of amendments that the Government have tabled, in respect of the children's commissioner and of other matters, is proof of that. Not every interested party will agree on every aspect of the Bill, but that is another issue. We have been engaged in a thorough process and have tried to listen to all the issues that people have raised.

In the little time that remains, I want to go back over the principal issues, and the question of whether we are establishing a powerful and strong champion for children. I shall then turn to the issues raised by those of my hon. Friends who represent constituencies in Wales.

I repeat what I said in Committee: I believe that the commissioner for English children that the Bill establishes—who will also have responsibility for British children on non-devolved issues—will be an extremely powerful and effective champion on behalf of children. In framing the commissioner's powers and duties, we have had regard for the UN convention on the rights of the child, which is why we listened to the arguments in support of amendments tabled in the upper House. As a result, the commissioner must have regard for the UNCRC, which proves that his work has its basis in children's rights.

However, we have also said from the start that we do not wish to establish in England a commissioner whose primary purpose is to police individual rights. A panoply of structures exists already—in the courts and various tribunals—that ensures that individuals can pursue their rights. The commissioner will have the duty to oversee those systems, ensuring that the complaint mechanisms and tribunals work and that the courts defend individual rights.

Yet we also want the commissioner to do more. We want him to look at the outcomes that children and young people say are important, and at the much wider picture of children's lives. He would report to Parliament and elsewhere on all those important matters. As I said in Committee, if a commissioner were in place today, he would be looking at matters such as how children and young people are portrayed in the media, their position in the criminal justice system, and child obesity. The commissioner may well also look at other important issues, but if he had to focus on policing individual rights, he would have no time to do anything else.

I assure the House that under the general functions laid out in clause 2 the commissioner will be independent and able to look at any issue or question.

He will be able to initiate inquires into any case that has wider significance and public policy implications. That is another example of how the Government have listened.

The commissioner will have total discretion over the budgets that he commands, except for the normal considerations of propriety. Another sign of the Government's willingness to listen is the fact that the commissioner will have access to children—a provision that we introduced to the Bill. In addition, the Government have amended the Bill to ensure that the commissioner can seek responses to the inquiries and recommendations contained in reports that he compiles. The commissioner will report annually to Parliament, and I hope that the relevant Select Committees will hold him to account.

Finally, I remind the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) that the word "rights" does not appear in the legislation setting out the functions of the disability rights commissioner.

I turn now to the issues raised by those of my hon. Friends with constituencies in Wales. Like them, the Government are anxious to ensure that children in Wales are no less well served by their children's commissioner than their counterparts in England would be. However, we must work within the devolution settlement as it stands. I know that some of my hon. Friends find that difficult, but we do not want the children's commissioner—who will report every year to this House through the Secretary of State for Education and Skills—to relinquish all responsibility for matters in Wales that remain the responsibility of Westminster.

Certain hon. Members have argued that we cannot change the devolution settlement in the context of this debate. I agree, and that is why we tabled three new clauses in Committee to clarify the role of the children's commissioners in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, and to enable all the UK commissioners to work together on non-devolved matters. Those amendments were accepted and now form part of the Bill.

We envisage that, in practice, the commissioners will draw up informal ways of working together on non-devolved issues that will be child friendly while at the same time remaining within the terms of the devolution settlement. To deprive children in Scotland, Northern Ireland or Wales of the services of the children's commissioner in respect of non-devolved matters would not enhance those children's national identity or culture. They will simply lose the services of a commissioner who has a general overview and represents all our children in matters affecting the United Kingdom as a whole that are decided in Westminster. They will therefore be worse off than their counterparts in England. I cannot believe that that is the wish of my hon. Friends in tabling those amendments or of the House, and I hope—

New Clause 4

APPEALS ABOUT INFORMATION HELD ON DATABASES

'The Secretary of State shall establish an appeals procedure by which individuals referred to on a database established under regulations under section 12 (explicitly or implicitly) in respect of a child whose case has been referred to that database may challenge the inclusion of information.'.—[Tim Loughton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Tim Loughton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 16—Procedures in relation to the processing of personal data—

'(1) This section shall have effect in relation to the provisions described in section 12 and the processing of personal data.

(2) The Secretary of State may not make any regulations under the provisions of section 12, or issue guidance or a direction under those provisions, unless the Information Commissioner has been provided with the opportunity to make representations as to any degradation in the protection afforded to data subjects or to any degradation in the effectiveness of any data protection principle which would be caused by the implementation of that regulation, guidance or direction.

(3) If the Secretary of State issues regulations, guidance or direction under the provisions of section 12 which, in the view of the Information Commissioner, degrade the protection afforded to data subjects or degrade the effectiveness of any data protection principle, the Information Commissioner may publish any relevant information, correspondence, document or advice which relates to the degradation in question.

(4) For the purposes of this Act, section 10(2) of the Data Protection Act 1998 (c.29) (exemptions from right to prevent processing likely to cause damage or distress) shall apply as if it read as follows—

> "(2) Subsection (1) does not apply in a case where any of the conditions in paragraphs 1, 2 or 4 of Schedule 2 is met."

(5) Personal data processed by any data controller for a purpose specified in regulations, guidance or direction made or issued under the provisions of section 12 shall not be processed for any other purpose unless that purpose is also specified in regulations made under powers authorised by this Act.

(6) For the purpose of this Act, "personal data" shall mean any data which relate to a living individual who can be directly or indirectly identified—

(a) from those data, or

(b) from those data and other information which is in the possession of, or is likely to come into the possession of, the data controller.

(7) For the purpose of this section—

(a) the definition of "data", "processing", "data controller" and "data subject" shall be the same as in section 1 of the Data Protection Act 1998;

(b) the "data protection principles" are the principles described in Schedule 1 to the Data Protection Act 1998;

(c) the "Information Commissioner" is the Commissioner established by the Data Protection Act 1998 and the Freedom of Information Act 2000.'.

Amendment No. 46, in page 9, line 32, leave out clause 12.Amendment No. 17, in clause 12, page 9, line 39, leave out 'one or more databases' and insert

'a United Kingdom-wide database and facilitate regional databases where appropriate'.

Amendment No. 2, in clause 12, page 10, line 15, leave out paragraph (g).

Amendment No. 18, in clause 12, page 10, line 15, leave out from 'of' to end of line 16 and insert 'concern for his welfare, such basis for concern having been set out in national guidance;'.

Amendment No. 3, in clause 12, page 10, line 17, leave out paragraph (h).

Amendment No. 38, in clause 12, page 10, line 39, at end insert—

'( ) The requirement to disclose information for agencies specified in subsection (6)(b) will not apply if disclosure would be detrimental to the child's welfare or safeguarding.'.

Amendment No. 19, in clause 12, page 11, line 2 , at end insert—

'(7A) The requirement to disclose information for agencies specified in subsection (6)(b) will not apply if disclosure would be detrimental to the child's welfare or safeguarding.'.

Tim Loughton: We now come to what could be, barring the smacking debate that we shall hold later, the most contentious part of the Bill and the one about which the Opposition have the most concerns. I want to talk to clause 12 as a whole. Amendment no. 46 would delete it, but other amendments in the group, as well as new clause 4 itself, would improve and make acceptable the whole section about databases.

This is an important part of the Bill. In Committee, we spent more than a morning on it, rightly, yet at the end of that time we had few assurances from the Minister for Children, Young People and Families about how the provisions would work, so we subsequently decided to vote against the whole clause. The upper House made some improvements to the clause, but although they were welcome they did not go nearly far enough.

In Committee, the Minister mentioned that she hoped our fears would be assuaged by the publication of the consultation document on the whole database system, which duly took place last week. We are grateful for that consultation document, but that is all it is—a consultation document. It is not a White Paper; it does not show a firm direction for the Government to take. The responses will not be in until the end of January, yet we are being asked, at this late stage of the Bill's progress, to write the Government a large blank cheque to set up powerful databases that would include each and every one of the more than 11 million children in this country.

The 10 trailblazer projects—pilots—being set up to try to investigate how such schemes could work are only halfway through their task. That work is being extended until March 2005 and the projects have just been granted second-tier funding, yet we are being asked to give the Secretary of State enormous powers to set up databases, about which there remain a lot of unanswered questions. The Government do not even know what the final identity and nature of those databases will be.

Even more worrying is the fact that only in the last week or so have we started to hear details about the Government's integrated children's systems, which, I gather, are to replace child protection registers by December 2005. They will be more detailed than child protection registers and will contain children's social care case records. They will operate in parallel with other case record systems, such as the NHS care record system for health practitioners.

The Minister has pledged £30 million to the project over the next two years, yet that was not mentioned once during the entire proceedings of the Bill in the upper House, on Second Reading or in Committee. Not once did the Minister allude to the fact that another much larger database is being constructed, for which money is already committed, and which will replace child protection registers.

Why was that not mentioned? How will the new system interact with the databases that we are discussing in the Bill? How will information be transferred? What arrangements have been made for security of access under the new systems? In answer to my written question

"what arrangements are already in existence to register children on a national register", the Minister replied:

"There are no arrangements in existence to register children on a national register."—[Official Report, 13 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 634W.]

Why was that?

What is this proposal if it is not a national register? We need much more information than we have been given so far.

Yet more alarm bells are sounding. The Information Commissioner, Richard Thomas, warned in an article in The Times earlier in the year that we risk

"sleepwalking into a surveillance society".

The arrangements have already been referred to as "Big Brother for children" in The Guardian. Children Now magazine recently warned:

"We need to avoid making professionals slaves to technology by placing undue burdens on them to record information. And we should question whether the benefits of storing copious information about children are offset by the disadvantages of information overload and creeping surveillance."

I share those worries.

3 pm

We said from the start that we are not against the principle of databases. We need databases to protect vulnerable children, but they should contain only minimal information and should not be a substitute for professionals talking to each other. Their scope should be limited to vulnerable children, rather than every single child in the country, because the system will otherwise be impractical and unworkable.

Liz Blackman (Erewash) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman has acknowledged Lord Laming's recommendation that information sharing is absolutely vital. He clearly welcomed the amendments to the provisions proposed by the Lords. He was complimentary about some of the information that is coming from his own trailblazer. He has asked for details about the consultation process throughout the passage of the Bill, and he now has them. Is he not just grandstanding when we should be getting on with cracking these thorny issues and making information sharing a reality for the safety of all our children?

Tim Loughton: The hon. Lady is absolutely right that it is essential to make information sharing a reality, but although we are told that the method in the Bill is the only way of doing that, we do not know exactly how it will work. Information sharing is a sensitive subject, as I shall illustrate with comments made by the British Medical Association and sexual health clinics. We need to get the system right or it could be entirely counter-productive. People will not present themselves if they do not want information to be shared by others, so although the principle of information sharing is right, we need a proper system. We have said all along that we do not understand how putting the names of 11.5 million children on a database—we do not yet know the extent of the other details that might be included—will benefit the tens of thousands of children who could realistically be described as children at risk or vulnerable children.

Mr. Dawson: The hon. Gentleman is entirely missing the point, which is surely that it is difficult to define the children who are at risk. The Government's proposal would flag up causes of concern among professionals, which would help to identify the children who are missed under existing systems—they will certainly be missed under any of his proposals.

Tim Loughton: We will come on to the definition of "cause for concern" in a moment because that is another worry. I still cannot understand how overloading a system with the details of 11.5 million children would help those who are most at risk. Many of the missing children to whom the hon. Gentleman rightly often refers—we debated them in Committee—will remain missing if such databases are in place because their parents, carers or private fosterers often want them to remain missing, but that is an entirely separate issue.

I want to pose some more questions to the Minister, although I want other hon. Members to have the opportunity to speak. She has said:

"we are not good at establishing IT systems"—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 21 October 2004; c. 240.]

We do not know how close we are to having available for the database information technology that would be interoperable with other services. We have received no assurances about security of access. We do not know which identifying marks will be used—will they be NHS or national insurance numbers? Clause 12(4)(h) is a catch-all provision that states that

"information of such other description, not including medical records or other personal records, as the Secretary of State may by regulations specify" may be included on the databases. What does that mean? What could be included? How long will the information be kept on the system? How will the system address the Soham loophole? Will information on children be kept after they reach 18?

Several problems have emerged due to conflicts in the proposals since the publication of the consultation document. A range of listed persons or bodies will be compelled to disclose information. There will be no caveats or exceptions to that requirement, except for the medical ones that I mentioned. When the Minister was asked in Committee about professional judgment, which we support, she said that permitting it would > "cause confusion because it would mean that practitioners would have to think about whether they should enter the fact that they are working with a child on to the database. The practitioner would have to apply a test whether disclosing the information that they were being asked to disclose would be detrimental to the child's welfare. We want to provide practitioners with certainty about using the database, not uncertainty."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 21 October 2004; c. 263.]

That effectively overrides the essential need for professional judgment to be applied, although we were promised that throughout the passage of the Bill. What will be the penalties for non-disclosure? Who will judge whether a case of non-disclosure was intentional or accidental? What will happen following a case of non-disclosure?

It is interesting to note that paragraph 2.19 of the consultation document states that a practitioner can override a professional duty of confidentiality to place a flag on the database. However, paragraphs 2.22 and 3.25 say that a practitioner may not be able to share information because of a duty of confidentiality. That raises the amusing possibility that two practitioners could flag the database and contact each other, yet be unable to discuss their reasons for doing so—such is the craziness of the consultation document and the Minister's proposals.

We have received strong expressions of concern from many professionals. The BMA asked:

> "How do Ministers envisage collating information required under Clause 9 . . . Will they use the route of the automated Exeter Registration System . . . run by the PCOs to collate the information? Whose responsibility will it be to provide the information—primary care organisations or individual GP practices? What impact will the requirements have on GP practices and primary care?"

It understands that

> "the database is expected to include the GPs' name and contact details for every child under 18 on their lists rather than for children about whom practitioners have a concern. The Minister appears to be saying that it is also the practitioner's responsibility to notify the data manager each time a child leaves a practice list, and every time a child registers with a new practice . . . Each practice could have around 440 children on its list and the BMA will need to explore with the Department of Health" how the logistics and any extra work load requirements will be addressed.

I recently received a letter from Brook Advisory Centres saying:

> "We are particularly concerned that young people's attendance at sexual health services might have to be notified to information databases. This concern was not allayed by the amendment during the Bill's passage through the House of Lords . . . Research has consistently demonstrated that confidentiality is of paramount importance for young people using contraceptive and sexual health services. Concerns about how far confidentiality is protected in General Practices and other sexual health services are among the issues most frequently raised by users of the Brook Young People's Information Service, which is accessed by 17,000 young people a year."

As one user of the service said:

> "I think it is an utter disgrace. Next they will be printing barcodes on the insides of your wrists. I know I would think twice about seeking any help or advice, instead of listening to street tales about contraception etc. It would be ridiculous and a bad move."

Brook and many children's charities are worried about how the database system will work.

Given that the Government are proposing such an important step change to the way in which we put information about each of our children on systems, they need to be better prepared and further down the road than they are at present. If they do not give us the real assurances that we need, they should consider removing the clause from the Bill. They could then do the work on it that is required and bring it back as a part of a criminal justice Bill. Such legislation could address the Soham loophole and related problems with databases that we have at the moment.

New clause 4, which we did not get to discuss in Committee, would set up an appeals procedure. There is no appeals procedure in the Bill that relates to any of the databases. There is therefore no defence against wrong information being placed on a database—wrong information that may be vexatious, which has been placed there as a result of a complaint made by a child against a teacher or a parent. Those records—we do not know the extent of what may be kept—may be kept for an indeterminate period and if used may count against the person mentioned. Surely, as with any other such database, there should be a mechanism by which people who want to challenge the veracity and relevance of the information stored about them can do so. There are no safeguards in the Bill, and that is a deep worry. Wrong information about people could be placed on the database either accidentally or intentionally, and their lives and records could be unjustifiably blighted as a result.

None of that detracts from the requirement, the necessity and the desirability of placing on the database worrying information about those who might be dangerous to vulnerable people. That is what databases should be about. However, we need proper checks and balances. At no point during the passage of the Bill have the Government provided reassurances on how an appeals mechanism could work and how long the information will be kept.

Amendment No. 17 would limit the Secretary of State to setting up one database. We now know why the Government resisted a similar amendment in Committee, saying that it might be appropriate for other databases to be set up. We are to have databases coming out of our ears, it would appear. The Minister claimed that accepting the amendment would prevent the Secretary of State from setting up a regional or a London-wide database, for example. There is a strong case for a London-wide database because of the nature of and interaction between all the boroughs in London, and the Climbié case clearly underlined that. I have no problem with that, but the Bill as it stands could facilitate it through co-operation between authorities.

[Tim Loughton]

In order to allay the Minister's objections to the amendment that we moved in Committee, we have slightly changed the wording so that it refers to facilitating "regional databases where appropriate". As we have gone that far to accommodate the Minister's concerns, perhaps she will tell us which other databases, about which we do not yet know, she envisages the Secretary of State will need to set up and which the amendment would prevent.

Amendment No. 18 is about the definition of "cause for concern". Hon. Members have mentioned the reference to it in clause 12(4)(g). This strange phrase has come out of the blue. To what types of concern does it refer? It would appear that it is intended to be all-encompassing: any concern about a child's behaviour, circumstances or developmental progress. By what standards are children and parents to be measured and a judgment on concern to be made?

As the Barnardo's briefing said:

> "Cause for concern is not a recognised criteria and will include unclear and subjective information of unproven worth, which may lead to inappropriate interventions while leaving vulnerable children at risk. Cause for concern is not a standard used or understood by the caring professions. Nor does it appear in any other child welfare or health legislation."

It certainly does not appear in the Children Act 1989. That contains

> "clear definitions of where local authorities can and must act when the child is in need. The child-in-need threshold is defined in statute and is associated with a range of additional powers in the supporting schedule. The Bill as currently drafted does not give professionals a common standard of that kind."

We need qualification of what the phrase really means. If we do not know what it means, practitioners in the field who will have to put the legislation into practice daily—GPs, social workers, teachers, the school nurse, the police—will be confused. They need to operate under one standard—hence the amendment suggests that we identify "cause for concern" and that a basis for it should be set out in national guidance. As I said in Committee, that guidance should be distributed among the professional bodies concerned, to ensure that all professionals sing from the same song sheet and operate under similar thresholds.

Amendment No. 38, which we have co-signed with the Liberals, and amendment No. 19, which we have tabled alone, are about not disclosing information if it would be detrimental to the child's welfare. That is self-explanatory, and we went into it at length in Committee. Extraordinarily, the Minister again did not take the point on board, although it is clearly in the interests of vulnerable children that such a provision should be in the Bill. We hope that the slight re-wording will make it more acceptable.

3.15 pm

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield) (Lab): I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's comments on databases. Obviously, I was not privy to discussions in Committee, but I have followed carefully his arguments on Second Reading and this afternoon. Do I understand him correctly in assuming that he is arguing that there should be a London-wide database and regional databases—such as one in west Yorkshire, for example—but not a national database? If so, what assumption is he making about the lack of mobility of families? The database that he suggests would not cover somebody moving from London to Leeds, but in my experience that happens quite regularly.

Tim Loughton: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, which is why I have been suggesting exactly the reverse throughout proceedings on the Bill. We are in favour of local databases that join up local professionals and which would probably come under the aegis of the director of children's services. We need greater clarification of how that information would be submitted and acted on, and at what point an intervention by social workers would be triggered. I am in favour of that for vulnerable children, such as those on the at-risk register and those who are looked after.

For exactly the reasons mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, I am also in favour of a national database—information for which would be passed from authorities that flag up children on their own databases. The most vulnerable children are usually the most mobile. A child on the radar of Newcastle social services who disappears and ends up in Brighton would need to be the subject of a central exchange of information, so that the social services director in Brighton could check on a national database for any form. The decision on whether intervention should occur should be left to the relevant authorities in the area where the child resides, with or without parents. We absolutely need a national database, but 11.5 million children do not need to be on it. We must concentrate on the most vulnerable children, to whom the most resources should be devoted. That is the great difference between us.

Clause 12 is very important and we shall certainly be pressing our amendments to the vote unless we receive some severe assurances from the Minister.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): I wish the Minister well with the Bill. Children need the protection afforded by this legislation. There have been too many horror stories of the system failing to co-ordinate the activities of professionals and children have been killed or abused as a consequence. However, there needs to be augmented protection of individuals from Ministers taking sweeping powers in establishing one or several information databases, which could interfere with private and family life—which, after all, is protected under article 8 of the United Nations convention on human rights. Therefore, my sole intervention on proceedings on this Bill is the tabling of new clause 16, which would go a long way to addressing the concerns expressed by the Joint Committee on Human Rights. The Committee warned of the human rights problem in paragraph 109 of its 19th report, which states:

> "We remain concerned about the lack of detail contained on the face of the Bill and the breadth of the regulation-making powers being conferred on the Secretary of State in a context involving serious interferences with Article 8 rights."

Another reason why the Minister should accept my new clause is that she may have been misdirected a little by her officials' analysis of the Data Protection Act 1998.

For instance, in her written evidence to the Joint Committee, published in the Committee's report on page 24, in reply to the question:

> "What is the proposed relationship between this legislation and the Data Protection Principles in the Data Protection Act?",

she said:

> "We expect the databases to fully comply with the Data Protection Act and do not want to make any special arrangements under data protection for them."

To my mind, that answer is clearly wrong, as clause 12 contains a host of special arrangements such as the wide-ranging ministerial powers that can be used to neutralise the data protection principles.

Let me give a background example to show why subsections (2) and (3) of new clause 16 are needed. In Scotland, the collection of dates of birth on the poll tax form was not deemed excessive because it was prescribed in regulations. In England and Wales, a tribunal ruled that it was excessive, because there was no need to collect everybody's date of birth. That did not conform with the data protection principles. That is what happened in England and Wales when the Data Protection Act applied. In Scotland, the opposite happened under ministerial regulations. Therefore, statutory prescription specifically weakened the privacy protection afforded by the Act, and I think that the same will happen under this Bill.

In clause 12, we see statutory provisions that could weaken data protection principles. Under subsection (6)(a), the Secretary of State has the flexibility to specify personal data that could be excessive for the purpose, and that neutralises the third principle of the 1998 Act. Under subsection (6)(b) to (f), the Secretary of State has the flexibility to specify in regulations disclosures that could otherwise be incompatible with the purpose of collection, and that neutralises the second principle. Under subsection (6)(g), the Secretary of State has the flexibility to specify in regulations a long, or even infinite, period of retention of data, and that neutralises the fifth principle. Under subsection (6)(h), the Secretary of State has the flexibility to specify in regulations criteria that allow inaccurate or out-of-date personal data to be retained on the database, and that neutralises the fourth principle.

Under subsection (13)(a) to (c), the Secretary of State can specify a level of security that is lower than the appropriate managerial level, and that neutralises the seventh principle. Under subsection (13)(d), the Secretary of State can transfer data abroad, outside the European economic area, and that neutralises the eighth principle.

In effect, the Bill gives the Minister control over how virtually all the data protection principles apply to personal data. The Information Commissioner cannot effectively enforce the principles if the Minister has used her powers in a way that degrades the protection afforded by each principle.

It will not be satisfactory for the Minister to give reassurance about consultation with the Information Commissioner. The point that I am raising is that there is no counterbalance in the Bill to stop any future Minister using the powers to set aside or degrade the protection afforded by the data protection principles. That is why, when the Minister told the Joint Committee that

> "We expect the databases to fully comply with the Data Protection Act and do not want to make any special arrangements under data protection for them",

I think that she is wrong. She is seeking powers that could be used to undermine any of the principles.

Subsections (2) and (3) of new clause 16 require the Secretary of State when issuing guidance or drafting regulations to allow time for the Information Commissioner to make representations on whether the protection afforded by the data protection principles or the protection in relation to data subjects is likely to be degraded. The Information Commissioner is also empowered to publish any relevant material that in his view shows degrading of the protection afforded by the Data Protection Act caused by a ministerial decision. That would also enable Parliament to be kept informed and have a debate if that was deemed necessary.

New clause 16(4) removes the Secretary of State's ability to override the right to object, which is granted in the Data Protection Act, and slightly to widen the right to object to meet the Joint Committee's concern. The right to object in the Act applies only in exceptional circumstances. There are two tests: the processing has to cause substantial distress and damage, and that distress and damage has to be unwarranted or unjustified. In many cases, there may be distress that is not substantial, or there may be distress but the processing is completely justifiable.

Such cases have been identified by the Joint Committee in paragraph 114 which states:

> "The information which may be included on the database about a child goes beyond purely objective facts about a child, such as their name, address and date of birth. It includes information, such as contact details of persons providing services including health services, which may reveal very sensitive information about the child, such as the fact that a seventeen year old girl has been referred to family planning services. It also includes 'the existence of any cause for concern' about a child, which is an extremely subjective and open-ended phrase which is almost bound to include very sensitive information about a child."

In paragraph 115, the Committee states:

> "We remind the Government that Article 8 requires that there be adequate procedural safeguards regulating the disclosure of sensitive personal information, and these may require participation by the person who is the subject of the information in decisions concerning the inclusion and disclosure of certain types of information".

My subsection dealing with the right to object meets the Committee's need for a safeguard, by removing the Secretary of State's ability to overrule the right to object. At present, it is a judicial process that determines whether there has been substantial distress and whether that processing should cease because it is unwarranted. In contested cases, it is the courts that determine the balance between the interests of those who run the information databases and those of the individual concerned. However, in this Bill the Minister is taking untrammelled powers to determine that her view will prevail. There is no balance there, and the proper judicial process should be reinstated.

New clause 16(5) requires any processing purpose of personal data under the Bill to be defined by regulations made under it. It basically negates an organisation processing personal data for a secondary purpose, even where that secondary purpose is authorised by other legislation. If the data are wanted for the secondary purpose, the Secretary of State's regulations should clearly say so. This is a major improvement. It limits processing purposes only to those identified under the Bill.

Subsection (6) amends the definition of personal data. That is necessary because the European Commission has sent the Government a 20-page infringement letter stating that the Data Protection Act 1998 is deficient and does not implement the data protection directive, 95/46/EC. Has the Minister seen that 20-page infringement letter? If so, has she taken it into account? If not, I cannot see how she can stand at the Dispatch Box talking about the protection of personal data when our UK Act is, according to the Commission, deficient in affording protection. As I said, powers are being enacted to override its already weak provisions anyway. My wide definition of personal data helps to resolve the matter and I ask hon. Members to support new clause 16 in that light.

3.30 pm

Mrs. Brooke: Many of the comments that the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) made underline our feeling that we are being asked to sign a blank cheque. Many questions remain unanswered. Despite last week's publication of the consultation document, I still believe that we have more questions than answers. We are not trying to be obstructive but it is difficult to vote on such an important issue without more details.

There is a problem of being out of synch when we hear on Report that some matters will not be concluded until January. I share the concerns of the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) but I want to place it firmly on record that I do not agree with his general stance. We need local databases with objective data and I cannot believe that they should be restricted to those identified as vulnerable. I therefore distance Liberal Democrat Members from that viewpoint. If we are genuinely to move towards a preventive agenda, we must have basic, simple information on everybody.

I repeat the anxieties that I raised in Committee. Once one moves away from objective data into the subjective realm, my concerns increase. Let us consider the term, "cause for concern". I have just used the word "concern"; everyone else uses it. There is no definition and I am not sure that I want anyone to start defining it. If we ask different professionals from different backgrounds to flag up a cause for concern on a database that will become available for other people to see, we must worry about the use to which it might be put.

The consultation document suggested that the intention was for a flag to be attached if one professional wanted to talk to another. I do not want to belittle that because I should like the Minister to respond to the point. I do not understand how the proposal will make it any more likely that people will communicate with each other. For example, one either looks at one's e-mails or one does not. Someone either opens the database and knows which children they need to look up to find the flag or they do not. I do not understand how it will work. It sounds simple: an indication that someone wants to talk to someone else. However, I cannot understand how it will work when there are so many children and when other systems of communication are far more direct. We all say that our professionals need to communicate directly with one another if we are genuinely to protect our children and intervene at the earliest possible stage.

I found the consultation document easier to follow on sensitive services. The Minister had picked up the points that many organisations raised but it is important to note that the NSPCC remained concerned about the Bill. It might be fairly content about subjects for consultation but the measure permits the disclosure that someone has accessed sensitive services. I fear that that will put off young people and parents from using the services. I am not assured about that matter.

I have tried to make it clear that I agree with some provisions and take a different approach from Conservative Front-Bench Members to others. Overall, we have more questions than answers and we must vote to express that opinion. It must be rare to have so many unanswered questions about a major Bill at this stage in the proceedings. I hope that I am making clear our support for the some provisions but despite that, we must vote to express our anxiety, which centres especially around the subjective nature of any data on the database.

Although we support the local databases, I should have liked some suggestion of the options for passing on data when the child moves. I do not perceive the necessity for a national database per se, but mechanisms must exist. There must be different methods and we need to be able to assess them and have an opinion. The proposal will not work if it is viewed as a massive intrusion into one's life by a national database that has masses of information about everybody. However, some of the most vulnerable children are those who are moved around for various reasons and I would be distraught if I believed that we had a system that allowed the children who need protecting the most to fall through the gap.

I am sorry that we do not have a range of options. I do not have a full grasp of how the system could work. I simply have an image of the principles that I want the Bill to retain. We cannot be confident that those principles are retained because of the lack of detail in the measure.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): It is obviously necessary to take every measure that we can to protect vulnerable children. Our ability to collect data more effectively and efficiently than in the past does not necessarily mean that it would be sensible to act on it. We should therefore consider the proposals carefully. I support my hon. Friends in their quest for a great deal more information from the Minister.

The hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) made a powerful case. His description of the way in which the Bill runs counter to the proper protection of the individual was impressive. The trouble is that the Minister does not have a good reputation for willingness to listen or for use of data. I am therefore not prepared to leave in her hands the decision about the information that goes on to the lists, especially when the provisions are remarkably imprecise. In many years in the House of Commons, I have never known an occasion on which the relevant professional bodies have criticised a Government Bill in such detail for lack of precision. I cannot recall circumstances in which a Minister's hon. Friend made such a devastating attack about data protection.

I was interested that the Brook Advisory Centre, an organisation of which I largely disapprove, singled out a fascinating matter. Information that cannot be given to parents could be given to the state under the Bill. That is a new system. The centres will be asked to put on a database information that they have spent all their time—in my view, wrongly—trying to remove from parents. That is amazing.

Margaret Hodge indicated dissent.

Mr. Gummer: If the Minister claims that that is not correct, why does the Brook Advisory Centre, which is close to her, appear to believe that it may be asked to do things of which it disapproves and that, in its view, would undermine its activities?

Apart from that, I want to discuss the phrase "cause for concern". I am amazed by the causes for concern that people manage to produce. If the phrase is not defined more effectively, I fear that many people in all sorts of areas will have causes for concern that involve their own views and attitudes rather than children. The Minister must free us from our cause for concern, which is lack of precision in the keeping of data about young people, who have the right to be protected in the same way as adults—we live in a world in which far too many people think it satisfactory to keep information about adults.

Lastly, I want to underline something that my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) said on holding data about those who are vulnerable. The idea that every child should be recorded in that way is immensely illiberal. Indeed, I was very surprised to hear the Liberal spokesman, the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke), once again underline the illiberality of the new Liberal party.

It is not acceptable to keep data on people for no reason and I cannot see why children should be put on a database unless there is a reason for it. I am perfectly prepared to protect people, even for the smallest of reasons, but the idea that data must be kept on every child in order to protect the vulnerable is the reverse of the truth, because the more data kept, the more likely it is that the data that one needs will be obscured.

The Minister has not proved her case either here or in Committee, and the House of Commons needs a better explanation than the one that she has given. The professional bodies are all as confused as the House.

Margaret Hodge indicated dissent.

Mr. Gummer: It is no good the Minister shaking her head, because the professional bodies have said that they are confused. The Minister may think that those bodies are all stupid, which is an attitude that she often takes towards people outside this House, but the fact of the matter is that they are confused. Unless she can remove the confusion of this House and the professional organisations, she will go down as a Minister who wants the power to do things as she thinks fit, and this House does not have confidence in her to do things as she thinks fit, because we have had too much experience of her.

Margaret Hodge: I regret that final contribution. When the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) comes to the House to discuss a serious matter such as this, he should read himself into it so that he can make a more informed contribution. He would do better to return to the Herbert Laming inquiry into the death of Victoria Climbié and the many other inquiries into the deaths of children.

Time and time again, such inquiries find that the same features went wrong. One thing that every inquiry into an unnecessary child death finds is that people failed to share information effectively. Our attempt to establish a system—a tool—that professionals can use better to protect and safeguard children and better to promote children's well-being should command respect and support from both sides of the House and should not be pushed around like a political football, as in the case of the remarks made by the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dawson: Is it not also the case that many deaths of children at the hands of parents and care givers come out of the blue as far as public agencies are concerned? Causes for concern would not be detected under the sort of system lamely proposed by Conservative Members.

Margaret Hodge: I agree entirely. I am conscious that hon. Members want to discuss other issues and hope that the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) will accept that we had a full debate on that issue in Committee. I shall simply say this: the information databases that we propose are no more than tools to support professionals in working together better. If professionals work together better, they may be able to prevent some other child's death. The databases are tools to shift the emphasis in how we work from simply intervening to protect children when things go wrong to, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) said, trying to intervene earlier to prevent children from going wrong. They are no substitute for the many systems that we have in place.

I want briefly to deal with some of the new issues that were raised in the debate. The first concerns the integrated children's system, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham. That is not the same as the information database, nor is it a national register—it is a framework for social services, working with children in need and their families. It will be supported by the computerisation of social services records that are currently kept on paper.

3.45 pm

As the hon. Gentleman well knows from the debate in Committee, those records would not appear on the databases where we are keeping the simple, basic information that can identify children and those who work with them. The integrated children's system will not contain information about all children, only the records generated by those working with children in need and it will not be accessed by all practitioners, only those working with the children who are specified. The hon. Gentleman's point was a red herring.

In new clause 4, the hon. Gentleman raises an issue that we did not have time to debate in Committee. I remind him, and my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen), that the databases will comply with the subject access provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998. That means that parents and children can exercise existing rights to see what information is held about them through a simple request to the database operator. They will be able to ask for inaccuracies to be corrected, and that must then happen.

Moreover, there are measures in criminal law that impose penalties for the misuse of data in computer records and under the DPA. It would be a breach of the fourth data protection principle, which deals with accuracy, knowingly to supply untrue data or to fail to delete inaccurate data. That can lead to enforcement procedures by the Information Commissioner; and failure to comply with an enforcement notice issued by the commissioner is a serious offence.

I do not want to return to the argument about a national database because the Committee in general—apart from the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham—supported the need for it. He knows, however, that our thinking is along the same lines as his: that we should have local databases, some on a regional level, whether it be London or Greater Manchester. They need to be inoperable—

Tim Loughton: Interoperable.

Margaret Hodge: I am sorry—the hon. Gentleman is right to correct me on that.

The Bill needs to provide for what we call the 151st system, which would ensure that all professionals know where to locate a child and that, if that child leaves one local authority area and moves to another, there is a system that holds a record of them until they re-emerge in another area.

I come to a concern that was expressed by several Members. The Bill contains a provision to enable a practitioner to inform another practitioner who subsequently accesses a child's record that they have a current concern about the child. That means that the second practitioner can see who else they should contact as a priority to determine whether their observations are related, so that together they can build a better all-round picture of the child's needs. That represents an added dimension to the information that the databases provide by simply holding the contact details of all the practitioners involved with a child. It will prompt contact and facilitate appropriate discussion to address the problem at an earlier stage. It is not a substitute for action—I said that in Committee and reiterate it today.

One would hope that in most cases placing a cause for concern on a database, as we suggested in the consultation document, would mean that the consent of the child and the family had been sought, and that only in the most exceptional circumstances where the child is at risk of harm and abuse would that happen without such consent.

I shall deal briefly with the important contribution made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead. I provided him with a written answer before the summer recess, in which I said that the databases would comply with the Data Protection Act 1998. I should also like to reassure him and all other hon. Members today. We are establishing a complex system and we need to work our way through a lot of difficult issues. Because we know that Members are concerned about these issues, we have said that we shall come back to both Houses of Parliament to seek affirmative resolutions as we go forward with the regulations and guidance. There is no hidden agenda here. There is no way in which any future Minister could misuse or abuse the powers in this part of the Bill. What we wish to do is move forward to try to establish better systems for sharing information. I hope that hon. Members will be satisfied by those added assurances.

Hon. Members have said that many children's organisations have concerns on this issue. Yes, but even during the first consultation on the first set of regulations, I have already had letters from organisations such as Barnardo's, the National Children's Bureau, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and the Children's Society, all welcoming the consultation in which we are engaged and recognising that it is starting to deal with some of the concerns that they had expressed earlier. Yes, it is only a consultation document, but we will come back to both Houses and use the affirmative resolution procedure to ensure that we have the support of everyone as we move towards regulations. Not to take advantage of this opportunity to provide a tool for professionals to share information, so that they can prevent the unnecessary deaths that we have witnessed, such as that of little Victoria Climbié, would be to miss the opportunity of a lifetime. I am not prepared to do that, and I hope that all hon. Members will share my wish to move forward with this part of the Bill.

New Clause 5

PRESUMPTION OF EQUAL PARENTING

'(1) The Children Act 1989 (c.41) is amended as follows.

(2) After section 1(1) (paramount consideration is welfare of the child) insert—

> "(1A) In respect of subsection (1)(a) above the court shall, unless a contrary reason be shown, act on the presumption that a child's welfare is best served through residence with its parents and, if its parents are not living together, through residence with one of them and through both of them being as fully and equally involved in his parenting as possible.".'—[Mr. Grieve.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Grieve: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The purpose of the new clause is to amend the Children Act 1989 to provide a subsidiary measure to that in section 1 of the Act dealing with the child's welfare being of paramount consideration, so as to make it absolutely clear that the intention—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The conversations that are breaking out throughout the House are making it difficult to hear the hon. Member who is addressing us.

Mr. Grieve: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The intention behind the new clause is to make it clear that, subject to the welfare of the child being the paramount consideration, it should also be the case that a presumption exists that a child should live with their parents and that, in the event of the breakdown of a family relationship, both parents should have as equal and full a possibility to provide input into their child's life. The proposal was the subject of what I regret to say was a rather ill-tempered debate in Committee. I am slightly surprised that that should be the case because I would have expected the Minister for Children, Young People and Families to support the sentiments underlying the new clause.

The position is extraordinary. Part I of the Children Act states that, when a court makes a determination, a matter on which I have absolutely no dispute. Sections 2 and 3 of the Act restate our common law principles, slightly amended, that it is the parents who have parental responsibility for their children. I am sure that the Minister would not disagree with that, otherwise we would have a situation akin to "1984" in which children can be arbitrarily removed from their parents at birth. Yet when we come to part II, dealing with the important issue of how a court approaches divorce, or indeed when we come to the parts of the Act that deal with care proceedings, the principles set out earlier in the Act are, surprisingly, not provided for at all. The issue—that the child's welfare is the paramount consideration—is simply left in the air.

> "the child's welfare shall be the court's paramount consideration",

That is why we have proposed the new clause. I make it clear to the Minister, for the avoidance of doubt, that it does not seek in any way to undermine the principle that the court should have paramount regard to a child's welfare, but it does seek to provide a framework within which the child's welfare interests are defined.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): It is a great shame that we do not have sufficient time to explore the issue properly but in stating clearly that the child's welfare is paramount—the hon. Gentleman has done so without equivocation, for which I am grateful—and in putting forward a proposal that one doubts will take us further than case law in terms of its effect, rather than its intention, does he agree that the most fruitful area for looking at more effective arrangements might have been the early interventions programme, which the Government have failed to implement as part of their family resolutions and which would have provided a pre-court arrangement?

Mr. Grieve: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman and I share his regret at the fact that the Government have not implemented the early interventions programme. We need such a programme; indeed, it is essential. However, I also believe that until we alter the principles in the statute, we cannot start driving home the message that people must co-operate to ensure that on the break-up of a marriage, both parents have the real possibility of a full and fruitful relationship with their children, so that they can have an input into their lives.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Does my hon. Friend accept that however welcome his comments are, the reality is that, regardless of the law's intention, the courts are biased in favour of the mother?

Mr. Grieve: I appreciate that that may have been a problem, but there has been considerable movement on that front. What is undoubtedly true is that the resident parent currently has a stranglehold over the ability to enable contact with the non-resident parent to work, be it the mother or the father. In many cases that might not be a problem, and the parties involved might be able to co-operate. But for the 10 per cent. of cases in which the parties involved are not willing to co-operate, there is no framework, despite the judiciary's best endeavours, through which to put relentless pressure on the resident parent to co-operate properly with court orders. So although one might get a contact order, it becomes meaningless, or contact is reduced to such a tiny level that is soon fizzles out, as inevitably it must. We have to address that.

Mr. Dawson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Grieve: I am sorry but I cannot; I want to give the Minister time to respond.

New clause 5 goes some way towards redressing the balance, and establishes a framework that in no way undermines the other parts of the 1989 Act. Indeed, on considering how to amend that Act, I initially contemplated tackling part II, but I concluded that it did not require reform; rather, what needed amending were the general principles. I hope that the Minister will accept the new clause in that spirit, and I look forward to hearing a positive response from her.

Margaret Hodge: I have only three minutes to deal with new clause 5, but I should point out that I am absolutely delighted that we have flushed out the position that the Opposition are attempting to take. This is an extremely difficult, high profile, contentious and controversial issue, and the Opposition have tried to jump on a bandwagon. At best, they are being disingenuous; at worst, they are being opportunistic. In my view, they have tried to exploit many fathers' quite proper frustration and misery at not seeing their children by raising false hopes—that is particularly true of the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May)—and have led people to believe that they would legislate for equal parenting and 50:50 residence. We have exposed that opportunism—

Mr. Grieve: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Margaret Hodge: No, I will not. This is another of the ill-thought out, hastily constructed and opportunistic policies that are designed to gain support from any quarter on any issue, in order to save a dying party. What an appalling way to exploit genuine human distress and misery.

We recognise that although the current system has the paramountcy of the interests of the child at its heart, it is not working as well as it should. That is why we have published a Green Paper, and why we are pursuing the "family resolutions" pilots that are up and running in three places. We know, as the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) himself knows, that under existing case law, in 99.2 per cent. of cases that go to court, contact between children and both their parents is maintained. We agree with the Opposition that the child's best interests are served by both parents maintaining responsibility for that child where it is safe for them to do so. We want to speed up the system and to introduce more mediation and conciliation. We also want to give the courts a wider array of appropriate enforcement measures to ensure that parents comply with court orders. What we will not do is to be populist in the short term against the interests of children in these very difficult situations, and we will not exploit emotions—

It being quarter past Four o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded to put the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

Tellers for the Noes:
Gillian Merron and
Mr. Nick Ainger

Question accordingly negatived.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for a Minister to use the wholly unreasonable guillotine on this debate to launch a personal attack on another hon. Member, confident in the knowledge that that hon. Member cannot respond? The guillotine means that serious issues affecting children, parents and grandparents in this country have not been addressed. Surely it is the Minister's job to deal with the issues under debate, rather than to launch a tirade of invective against the Opposition. The serious issues involved in this Bill have not been considered, and the Minister has not put the interests of children first.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): The timing of the debate is not the responsibility of the Chair and was decided by the House earlier. Had the Minister been out of order in any of the things that she said, I would not have allowed her to say them.

New Clause 12

REASONABLE PUNISHMENT

'(1) Battery of a child cannot be justified in any proceedings on the grounds that it constituted reasonable punishment.

(2) Battery of a child is not unlawful if the act amounts to the use of reasonable force in order to—

(a) avert an immediate danger to the child or any other person;

(b) avert an immediate danger to property; or

(c) prevent the commission of a crime, or an act which would be a crime if the child had reached the age of criminal responsibility.

(3) For the purpose of subsections (1) and (2), "child" means a person under the age of 18.

(4) Section 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 (c.12) (cruelty to persons under sixteen) is amended as follows.

(5) At the end of subsection (7) insert "subject to subsection (8)".

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

(6) After subsection (7) insert—

"(8) Corporal punishment administered to a child cannot be justified in any proceedings on the grounds that it was administered in pursuance of a right exercisable by virtue of subsection (7).

(9) For the purpose of subsection (8), administering corporal punishment to a child means doing anything for the purpose of punishing that child which would constitute unlawful battery.".'.—[Mr. Hinchliffe.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield) (Lab): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 23, in page 37, line 18, leave out clause 56.

No. 39, in page 37, line 33, at end insert—

'(6) Two years after the commencement of this section, the Secretary of State shall undertake a review of the effect of the provisions of subsections (1) to (5) on the number of convictions for the offences specified in subsection (2).

(7) As soon as practicable after the completion of the review under subsection (6) the Secretary of State shall lay before each House of Parliament a report on the outcome of the review.'.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I want to begin by repeating the warm welcome that I gave on Second Reading for the broad thrust of the Bill. In general, it is a very positive measure. With some minor amendments, it could represent a genuinely historic step forward in children's welfare.

New clause 12 deals with the physical chastisement of children. I accept that this is a highly contentious matter for some, and that it generates strong feelings among a significant number of people. I also accept that it is not any easy matter for any Government to address, as some people will accuse them of establishing a so-called nanny state and of interfering in the private domain of the family. I am therefore very grateful to the ministerial team responsible for the Bill for their willingness to listen, over a long period of time, to the concerns and arguments of those of us who believe that children should have equal protection in law from assault.

I am grateful to my right hon. Friends the Minister for Children and the Secretary of State for Education and Skills for the time that they have devoted to this issue. I am also grateful to those who are—shall we say—at even higher levels of the Government for a dialogue that has ensured that serious thought has been given to how we can make progress in respect of protecting children.

I shall not dwell on the outcome of our dialogue, save to say that it is unfortunate that Labour members have been whipped to vote against a new clause that has the overwhelming support of every child protection agency in the country. For some, this is an abstract academic issue, but for many hon. Members, and myself, it is about the basic human rights of a significant proportion of our population. Our arguments are based not on policy briefings from worthy organisations but on the experience that some of us have gained from working in child protection with vulnerable and abused youngsters. Our strength of feeling comes from the certain knowledge that our laws and society could do a great deal more to ensure their well-being.

4.30 pm

Jonathan Shaw: My hon. Friend told the House that a range of child protection agencies supported his amendment. Is he aware that Lord Laming, the author of the Victoria Climbié report that led to the introduction of the Bill, does not support his amendment and, indeed, supports the Government's position?

Mr. Hinchliffe: Lord Laming appeared before the Health Committee, and we discussed the matter. I do not know why he does not support the amendment, bearing in mind the fact that the escalation of injuries to this girl stemmed from what might be termed "gentle smacking". His personal perspective differs significantly from that of his predecessor, Sir William Utting, who was a strong supporter of the arguments that I shall make.

I am the first to agree that the vast majority of children, even most of those whose parents use physical chastisement, are probably better treated now than at any other time in history. For a minority whom the current law does not protect properly, however, the reality is very different. It is a scandal and a disgrace that in 21st century Britain, at least one child every week—more than 80 children every year—dies at the hands of their parents or carers. Compared with many similar countries, our record on child deaths is appalling.

Like my colleagues who have worked in child protection, I do not just think that there is a connection between our shocking levels of child deaths and laws permitting so-called reasonable chastisement; I know that there is. I have witnessed in individual cases the progression from what is now called "gentle smacking" to serious injury and, in a couple of instances, death from shaking, hitting, punching and beating. I have direct experience of the inability of a child protection agency to stop a child suffering serious beating because of a court's acceptance of the reasonable chastisement defence.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that those serious injuries and deaths are already illegal, and that the problem is the behaviour of parents who commit illegal acts, not the behaviour of the vast majority of parents who are trying to keep their children within reasonable bounds of discipline?

Mr. Hinchliffe: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to expand my argument, I will address that point.

New clause 12 seeks to right a long-standing wrong for children. It has the modest aim of giving children equal protection from assault, but has substantial potential to reduce all forms of violence. Equal protection means what it says; hitting a child will be unlawful to exactly the same extent as hitting an adult. Some adults and, sadly, even some Government Ministers are fond of using the term "smacking" to make them feel more comfortable with what they are condoning or defending. Children, however, tell it as it is; smacking is hitting, and smacking hurts. It does not just cause physical pain, but hurts inside too.

The new clause would criminalise hitting to exactly the same extent as hitting adults. That is equality, and children, who are far more fragile and vulnerable than us, deserve nothing less. Some members of the Government have said that they do not want parents to be criminalised for hitting their children. If they mean that they will not apply the criminal law on assault equally to assault by parents on children, we are on opposite sides of the fence. If they mean that they do not want parents to be drawn into the criminal justice system, charged and prosecuted for minor assaults on children, we are on the same side. No one in their right mind would think it constructive, apart from in very exceptional circumstances, to pursue parents into court for trivial assaults. Prosecution of parents is seldom in the interests of their dependent children, but that cannot be used as an excuse for leaving the law unclear, and sending the message that hitting children, unlike hitting adults, is acceptable.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): The hon. Gentleman will know that since the law was changed in Germany in 2000, not one parent has been criminalised. Does he agree that the issue at the heart of the Bill is summed up in the film of Roald Dahl's "Matilda", in which Danny DeVito says to his daughter, "I'm big and you're small. I'm right and you're wrong"? It is not only about quality, but about defending the most vulnerable in society. It is plainly wrong that a 13-stone, 40-year-old man can hit a four-stone seven-year-old child. We just have to change the law.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I did not see the film, but I agree with its message. The only way to clarify the law and send a clear message that hitting children is at least as wrong and unlawful as hitting anyone else is to give children equal protection by removing the existing defence of reasonable chastisement altogether.

Peter Bradley (The Wrekin) (Lab): Through an honest sleight of hand, my hon. Friend has elided smacking and hitting. Most responsible parents are well able to distinguish between smacking that does not cause lasting harm and hitting, which certainly would. When he listed the ways in which those 80 children met their tragic deaths, he identified shaking and other forms of assault, but did not refer to smacking. It is clear to most reasonable people that assault is a different kettle of fish from disciplining a child in a loving family environment.

Mr. Hinchliffe: My hon. Friend gets us into the heart of the debate. I have been in court when the same point has been raised in individual cases. Is a smack in the mouth a hit? What is the difference between a smack and a hit? What is a gentle smack and what is a more serious, heavier smack? There are different smacks from different people. I weigh 16 stone. If I smacked my hon. Friend, it would be different from someone who was 10 stone smacking him. We need to consider how difficult it is for the courts to come to terms with the doubts that he raises.

To pursue the point further, I have argued that we need to get rid of the reasonable chastisement defence. Those who cannot accept what I believe to be a common-sense approach have been scaremongering that it is unworkable or that the child protection police and prosecution services will pursue prosecutions for so-called gentle smacks.

The evidence of the Director of Public Prosecutions has been grossly misrepresented. In his evidence to the Joint Committee on Human Rights, he said, reasonably enough, that he could not guarantee that parents would never be prosecuted for minor assaults on their children. He stated:

> "The reality is that we would have to have some sort of policy about this but I think it would be inconceivable for us to draft a policy that would be so wide as to say that minor assaults on children would never be prosecuted because there clearly could be circumstances where they would be. One might posit an example of a child who was mentally handicapped or a child who was subjected to sexual abuse or other forms of assault. So we would not and could not draft guidance which would absolve all minor acts of battery against children from criminal prosecution. That said, the reality is that, just as most minor assaults against adults are not prosecuted, I suspect most minor assaults against children would not be either, although it is not an entirely accurate analogy because children are much more vulnerable than adults."

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): How does the hon. Gentleman square the DPP's view with the Crown Prosecution Service allegedly telling the Government that the new clause would criminalise a huge number of people?

Mr. Hinchliffe: The view of the CPS appears to be contradicted by what the DPP told the Joint Committee and also what the Association of Chief Police Officers said to me last week.

The DPP did not say that equal protection was unworkable. He said that Parliament should decide. Two tests have to be satisfied before any prosecution goes ahead: the evidential test and the public interest test. The public interest test invariably includes consideration of the best interests of the affected child. It is hard to understand how charging and prosecuting a parent for a minor assault that causes no injury is going to pass the tests and go ahead except in extreme circumstances. That does not render the law meaningless. On the contrary, it shows it to be sensitive.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend's arguments are very persuasive; we pursued many of them in both my Select Committee and his. However, the proposals would bring a big change in our law. Does not he think that trying the new system for two years, monitoring it and then making a judgment would give us a means of transition for people we represent who are unpersuaded? Would not that be a more positive way forward?

Mr. Hinchliffe: If by "the new system" my hon. Friend means the one included in the Bill by the House of Lords, I shall be going through exactly what all the agencies concerned with child protection are saying about clause 56.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hinchliffe: No, I am sorry, but I have to make some progress. Other Members want to speak in this brief debate.

All the associations representing those who will need to work on equal protection are agreed that it is workable and safe; all of them. I have met and talked with representatives of the Association of Directors of Social Services, the Association of Chief Police Officers, social workers, the NSPCC, health visitors and paediatricians. They all believe emphatically—to respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman)—that clause 56 is unworkable and unsafe.

The position of the police is especially worthy of note. The House will recall that in the Lords debate on equal protection Lord Condon—who, as Paul Condon, was a distinguished Metropolitan Police Commissioner—said that he was absolutely certain that the status quo should not prevail and that parliamentarians > "have an historic opportunity to establish a pragmatic, symbolic and new legal approach to protecting children".

He said that peers

> "should not be deterred by a fear of unleashing hundreds of thousands of police inquiries into trivial allegations and pitting child against parent in frivolous circumstances".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 5 July 2004; Vol. 663, c. 549.]

Only last week, I met Chief Constable Terence Grange, who speaks for ACPO on child protection matters. Subsequently, he wrote to me, setting out the association's views on the serious problems that would arise for the police should clause 56 become law. I have a copy of his letter if anybody wants to look at it. He stated:

> "The proposed Clause would introduce randomness in terms of the child's physiology and the background of the parent, working class families tend to have much rougher hands than lawyers, bankers, etc. Some children redden or bruise much more easily than others. Such randomness and the use of age to differentiate between common assault and actual bodily harm is, in my view, likely to lead to much more complexity."

In addressing specifically the removal of the reasonable chastisement defence, Chief Constable Grange stated that > "since 2002, the police service in England and Wales has adopted an approach of recording crime whereby if a child or a witness or a member of the public had called to allege that a parent had smacked a child, that matter would be recorded as a crime. That does not mean that prosecution would follow, there is a well established procedure under 'Working Together' that enables the police and social services to decide on the best course of action and that would be followed. Therefore, if Parliament removes the defence I would anticipate no lasting issues which would make the situation unmanageable for the Police. The matter would be recorded as a crime and investigated by police or social services, dependent on the evidence, injury and a view on what is best for the family, as happens now . . . There may be an increase in allegations, however, given the increase in police resources over the last four years I am confident that we could cope with that. It is my view that were the change to be made over a reasonable period of time the number of allegations would fall, as given a good education programme by Government, rather like drink driving, smacking a child would become socially unacceptable".

Chief Constable Grange concludes his letter on behalf of ACPO by saying that > "removing the defence of reasonable chastisement would not create an unmanageable situation for the police force. The proposed clause 56 would introduce far more complexity than it would solve, as one example, the police would be seeking statements from Doctors and Paediatricians at such a level that I think they would find that unmanageable. We take no view on whether or not the defence should be removed. If Parliament removes the defence the police service in England and Wales will be able to manage the consequences".

As Chief Constable Grange indicates, the police must work closely with members of the medical profession on such matters. It is important to note that the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health, which represents paediatricians involved in child protection, is a signatory to a multi-agency statement that claims that clause 56 is unsafe and unworkable and that supports equal protection. Other signatories to the statement include the Community Practitioners and Health Visitors Association, the NSPCC, the British Association of Social Workers and the Association of Directors of Social Services.

4.45 pm

Mr. Steve Love of the children and families committee of the ADSS wrote to me on behalf of the association to state its clear views. He said:

> "We would welcome the greater clarity that will result that children be given the same protection as adults. I believe this would assist frontline practitioners in reinforcing the message that physical punishment is not an appropriate method of providing care and control for children."

He continued:

> "I think the proposed introduction of Cl. 56 would create an additional complication to what are already complex matters. The current threshold of 'significant harm' for formal child protection investigations would now have another standard if Cl. 56 was introduced. It's difficult to see how the standard could be applied consistently, as what may bruise one child may not bruise another. Social Services Departments are working hard to ensure a careful, measured and consistent approach for those involved in protecting children. I do not believe the introduction of Cl. 56 will do anything to assist".

In the light of such clear statements from all those in the front line of child protection, the scaremongering about the reform is frankly unacceptable. If there are still people in 2004 who want to defend hitting children, they should do so honestly, rather than hiding behind the misrepresented effects of reform that have been peddled over the past few weeks.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): Part of the hon. Gentleman's argument is the idea that children should be equally protected from being hit or smacked, whichever word one chooses to use. However, there is a difference between a child and a parent. A parent has a duty of care to a child and carries that out by putting it to bed, giving it food, looking after it and giving it moral guidance and help with discipline so that it may become a proper civilised adult. Smacking might be appropriate in that context. Why does he want to influence the relationship between a responsible parent and a child who may well need proper guidance?

Mr. Hinchliffe: We could argue on that basis that perhaps people with learning difficulties lack a sense of reason. Should we thus suggest smacking them, because that is exactly the same argument?

Mr. Kerry Pollard (St. Albans) (Lab): May I offer my hon. Friend some support? As a father of seven children, I believe that I have more parenting skills than most in the House, and I say, "Don't smack children."

Mr. Hinchliffe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

I want to conclude in a moment so that other hon. Members have the opportunity to speak. People who oppose new clause 12 because of the risk that a parent might, in exceptional circumstances, be prosecuted for what is perceived as a minor assault should not fool themselves that they have the backing of those charged with a responsibility for child protection; clearly, they do not. The Joint Committee on Human Rights has heard evidence on the matter from the Director of Public Prosecutions and others. In its 19th report in September, it emphasised the fact that equal protection would provide more legal certainty than clause 56. No one has challenged the law of assault against adults as not providing legal certainty. No one would suggest that we should decriminalise the minor slapping of women, confused elderly people or those with learning difficulties, who, like young children, might have limited powers of reasoning. I am merely proposing to extend the existing law to cover children equally. We have already extended equal protection to children in schools, nurseries and so on. This is the last logical step in establishing equality.

Colleagues who have looked at debates on the Bill in the House of Lords will have seen that some particularly absurd examples were cited. One Member asked whether we really wanted to criminalise the exasperated parent who smacks her child to stop him running into the road for the fourth time. Well, do we really want to decriminalise the exasperated but loving daughter who smacks her confused father who is suffering from dementia and who is also straying into the road for the fourth time? Again, we must not confuse the law, which must be clear and take sensible common-sense approaches to prosecution. All assault and battery should be unlawful. In either of the examples, can anyone seriously envisage the perpetrators being dragged off to court?

If there are not to be wholesale prosecutions, some will ask what is the point of changing the law if we are not going to enforce it. Let us be clear that removal of the defence will make prosecution easier in cases where it is necessary to protect children from significant harm and doing so is in the child's best interests. At the moment, the law inhibits the child protection system at every stage. Most importantly, it inhibits those working with families in intervening early with clear and supportive messages, rather than waiting for significant injury.

The concept of prosecution and punishment is just one purpose of the law. Prosecution in this area is a demonstration of the law and the system failing to protect the child. The higher purpose of the law and its particular purpose when dealing with the private sphere of the family is to set a standard, send a clear signal, educate, change the culture, change individual attitudes and satisfy human rights.

Through its policies on the physical punishment of children, Britain is in breach of its obligations under both the United Nations convention on the rights of the child—signed up to by a Conservative Government some years ago—and the United Nations convention on human rights. Twelve countries have already introduced equal protection. If they can do it, so can we. The new clause has the support outside Parliament of the largest and broadest alliance ever assembled to pursue an issue on behalf of children. We should listen to its argument, and in particular to the unanimous voice of our child protection agencies, and vote to ensure that the welfare of our children is properly safeguarded in law.

Mrs. Brooke: We have just heard a comprehensive run-through of most of the main arguments, and as time is limited and many hon. Members want to speak, I shall not repeat them. I want to reflect on the fact that the defence of reasonable chastisement has been challenged in the European Court of Human Rights and a judgment has been made. The Joint Committee on Human Rights in this place believes that something must change as a result of that judgment.

In accepting that something must change, let us consider the amendment agreed in the House of Lords, which now forms clause 56. I regard it effectively as a sticking plaster. I am sure that legalistically it addresses the fundamental issue that we are in breach of various conventions, but as the Joint Committee on Human Rights says, it is likely that there will be further incompatibilities in future. So, if anything, clause 56 would be only a temporary fix and does not tackle the main issue. If we think about it, putting a sticking plaster on something makes one feel better and more comfortable. I worry that clause 56 makes people feel a little better because they think that they are tackling the worst of abuses and that therefore things will be all right. That concerns me greatly. For that reason, I support new clause 12, but I do not do so lightly. It has taken me quite a long time to come round to that and to have the courage to speak up on it.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): What would happen where a parent had smacked a child in the privacy of the home, just the two of them? How would the child have protection? Is the idea that the child would know about this law, go to the police, and then the police would have to adjudicate between parent and child, one saying yes and the other no? How far will the intrusion go and could it be successful for the child?

Mrs. Brooke: I shall continue with my points and address that question at an appropriate point rather than diverting from my main issue at this stage.

I was saying that I do not support the new clause lightly. I have given it a great deal of thought and I am aware that many people will disagree with this approach, but it is an opportunity to show leadership. So much of the legislation in which I have been involved has been reactive. We constantly try to do something in our criminal justice system about bad behaviour, violence and physical assault, but this is an opportunity to start at the root causes.

What does physical punishment achieve? Research shows that it does not change behaviour but suppresses it, and suppressing behaviour almost certainly means that it comes out in another form, particularly when the person who administers or might administer the punishment is not around. That creates the potential for children to hit out at one another in the playground. After all, what have they seen in the home? What are their role models? Any form of physical punishment sets that lead.

Until I became a Member of Parliament, I had not realised that some children, particularly in certain home settings, see types of behaviour that I could not even comprehend—I am referring to cases of sexual abuse—yet they become a norm. We are talking about norm referencing here. Any form of violence within the home has a spin-off effect outside the home and in future family relationships.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con) rose—

Miss Kirkbride rose—

Mrs. Brooke: I shall continue my argument, if hon. Members do not mind. I am sure that they will have plenty of opportunity to speak later.

Physical punishment is ineffective and has other consequences. There is also the important point about equality for children and adults, which I see in terms of the respect that we have for one another as individuals, and that respect is broken down.

Mr. Malins: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Brooke: I shall continue the points that I am making.

If we stop and think carefully, we are not making a positive contribution. It is often said, "It never did me any harm," but the research shows overwhelmingly that physical punishment certainly does no one any good. We have a positive opportunity to show real leadership and set a change in culture for the 21st century. People will not change their behaviour overnight. It will be gradual and any move along these lines needs an enormous amount of support and parental education.

Let us consider a familiar scenario. In a busy shopping centre one inevitably comes across a parent who is having an extremely frustrating time with a youngster. They are pushed to the limit of their endurance and perhaps hit their child round the head or hit hard, and I flinch when I see that. I imagine that that applies to most people. I understand the situation because, as a parent, I have been pushed to the limit of endurance, too. We can all acknowledge that. We are not considering criminalising normal behaviour.

Other countries take a sensible approach. It is accepted that it takes time to moderate behaviour and that one cannot simply go from one control system to another without supporting education. However, we could be proud of our leadership if we accepted the new clause. I do not view it as an example of being a nanny state because we would set the foundations for improving behaviour in society and for some of the values that we all support. We see violence on the streets, and perhaps we have set the bad example.

In answer to the point that the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) made, senseless criminalisation has not occurred in other countries. It is worth attending briefings by representatives of Germany and Sweden. Europe has a long history of making improvements in this respect. Deaths from abuse have more or less disappeared in Sweden, where the problem is managed so much better. I ask all hon. Members to examine their consciences and consider supporting new clause 12.

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): I want to speak about amendment No. 39, which I framed after discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Woodward), who, as a trustee of ChildLine, has done much to help vulnerable children. I want to put on record my thanks to him for his work on behalf of vulnerable children throughout the United Kingdom.

The law, which allows reasonable chastisement of a child, fails to protect children who are physically abused. It allows their abusers a loophole at trial and prevents other cases from coming to trial. The alterations that were made in another place present an unsatisfactory compromise, allowing children to be hit but placing a physical marker on how hard they can be hit and in what way. That is dangerous because children mark in many different ways for different lengths of time, and shaking and blows to the head often do not offer the physical proof that would have to be brought as evidence to ensure a conviction. The proposal is impractical because it will place doctors and paediatricians in a difficult position in determining what constitutes minor bruising and thus whether a child is covered by the new law. That is unsatisfactory.

However, although my hon. Friend and I believe that the current law fails to protect a child, we acknowledge the need to bring the public with us. That is why we propose, as a practical way forward, a Government review two years after the introduction of clause 56. It should be followed by a report to the House for our consideration. I stress that, if the review shows that the child abuse statistics have not dramatically improved, legislation will need to be reconsidered. That should happen only after we have had a proper time to consider the effectiveness of the proposals.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I want clause 56 to be removed from the Bill because, like the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), I believe that it worsens the position. The hon. Gentleman spoke of the need for a careful, measured and consistent approach to assist those who care for children and he mentioned several agencies that supported his careful, measured and consistent approach. The group that he did not mention in that connection was those who have the greatest responsibility for bringing up children: parents. I am not fortunate enough to be a parent, but I have no doubt that the best way to bring up children is with their two natural parents. Not all of us achieve that aspiration—we do not, of course, condemn those who do not achieve it—but parents have a unique relationship with their children and a unique responsibility to bring them up as citizens of tomorrow, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) suggested. We know that the overwhelming majority of parents not only do their best, but do an excellent job of bringing up children. Just as we make mistakes from time to time in our personal and political lives, so, under much greater pressure than us, do parents.

Mr. Malins: Does my hon. Friend agree that if the defence of reasonable chastisement is abolished, it will criminalise millions of decent, loving parents who use a smack from time to time, whereas those few parents who assault their children horribly and are guilty of a criminal act will simply take no notice?

Mr. Turner: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The police and other agencies currently face the difficulty of tracking down and securing convictions against those who horribly abuse their children.

Mr. Llwyd: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the recent "Children are Unbeatable!" alliance poll, in which 74 per cent. of parents—the figure for parents under 24 is 76 per cent.—said that they are against beating and smacking?

Mr. Turner: I am aware of that poll. It did not mention "beating"; it talked about "hitting". It was taken in 2004.

Mr. Llwyd: This year.

Mr. Turner: Yes; the poll is up to date. The definition of "hitting" adopted in the preamble to the poll included a slap or smack, but when the actual question was asked, the poll did not use the words "slapping" or "smacking"—it used the word "hitting", in the sense of hitting not a child but family members. That is the perverted way in which the questions were asked on behalf of the "Children are Unbeatable!" alliance.

Many other surveys have been undertaken. MORI conducted a survey for the National Family and Parenting Institute, which claimed after that survey that only one in five parents think that smacking is an effective way to teach children the difference between right and wrong. However, parents were not asked whether smacking is an effective way to teach children the difference between right and wrong, but whether it is the most effective way, and one in five parents think it the most effective method.

A British Market Research Bureau survey in July 2004 found that 85 per cent. of respondents think that parents should have the right sometimes to smack their children. In a survey undertaken on behalf of the Department of Health in 1998, 88 per cent. of respondents agreed that it is sometimes necessary for parents to smack their children. Let us examine all the surveys, rather than just one.

Peter Bradley (The Wrekin) (Lab): I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to confirm the findings that he has just set out. I conducted a survey on the issue in my constituency, where 89 per cent. of respondents said that they do not want to see smacking banned. However, 71 per cent. wanted the law clarified to distinguish between smacking and hitting—the distinction is between disciplining a child in a loving relationship and assaulting and abusing a child. My constituents want to see the law make that distinction, and I am slightly disappointed that the hon. Gentleman does not.

Mr. Turner: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, which brings me neatly on to what is wrong with clause 56. The amendment that Lord Lester moved in the other place throws the law on smacking into confusion. It removes the reasonable chastisement defence in three cases—wounding, grievous bodily harm and cruelty. That is entirely justifiable, but it will make no difference because a court is unlikely to accept that chastisement with such effects is reasonable. Indeed, the reasonable chastisement defence has been attempted in only 11 cases since 2001, and in only five of those was a conviction not secured. Lord Lester's amendment would retain the reasonable chastisement defence for assault and for battery, but abolish it for assault causing actual bodily harm. That is the nub of the problem, because the definition of assault causing actual bodily harm includes tenderness and bruising; and, as the hon. Member for Wakefield said, some children bruise more easily than others.

It follows that a parent who administers a quick slap in a supermarket, perhaps to foreshorten the sort of childish tantrums to which the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) referred, will be guilty of a criminal offence if it causes actual bodily harm such as tenderness. That is not to say that they will be prosecuted, but they will be criminalised. The hon. Member for Wakefield agrees with me about that.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The question also arises as to whether this will result in a misuse of police resources. Does my hon. Friend agree that if a member of the public saw a child being struck in a public place, and then reported that matter to the police, the police would have to make detailed inquiries to discover whether there was an underlying case of abuse in that particular case?

Mr. Turner: I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend. The hon. Member for Wakefield says that the police are recording such reports now, so we can imagine how many more there would be if there were even more confusion about what the law means, which would be the result of Lord Lester's amendment.

Mr. Simon Thomas: The hon. Gentleman has made the case that clause 56 is rubbish and does not hold water, so we can at least agree on that. He now wants to rely on the ancient common law defence of reasonable chastisement. Is he aware that that defence once applied to wives and servants as well? In what sense does he think that we should, in the 21st century, extend a protection that allows children to be, in his own words, bruised or harmed?

Mr. Turner: I should have thought that there is an obvious difference between a child who is not yet, or is in the process of becoming, a moral being and a wife or a servant, who, one would hope, already is. The loving relationship that parents have with their child is part of what informs the way in which they bring them up. It may be argued—indeed, it was put to me by members of the Isle of Wight youth council, who lobbied me vigorously and eloquently last Wednesday—that no one will be charged with this offence. There are prosecuting guidelines, and the police and social services have discretion. The problem with the guidelines, however, is that the authority has discretion whether to apply the law, and different authorities, even those operating on the same guidelines, can reach different and perfectly reasonable conclusions about how to apply the law.

Mr. Robathan: Does my hon. Friend agree that even if no one is charged, the police or some social worker— [HON. MEMBERS: "Some social worker?"] I am glad that Labour Members find it so amusing, but aiming to criminalise millions of people is a serious matter. The police or a social worker, who know neither the parents nor the child, will come to interview them and drive a wedge between them.

Mr. Turner: I would be surprised if they did not; and better authorities than I have said that such interviews cause trauma within families.

The Attorney-General has stated that the Director of Public Prosecutions intends to revise his guidelines to make it more likely that people will be prosecuted for actual bodily harm than for assault, although that means that they will not have the defence of reasonable chastisement. He said:

> "The effect of that pending change is that even minor assaults by a parent on a child, where—among other things—"minor bruising" or

> "swelling . . . are caused, will normally be charged as assault occasioning actual bodily harm."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 5 July 2004; Vol. 663, c. 563.]

As if that were not bad enough, the guidelines apply only to the police and the Crown Prosecution Service, not to other prosecuting authorities or private individuals. That will lead to greater confusion among parents about how they are permitted to discipline their children. The CPS and the police might say one thing, but a private prosecution, perhaps backed by a militant anti-smacking lobby, might say something different.

I echo the view of the hon. Member for Wakefield that clause 56 is a muddle and makes the law more, rather than less, complicated. The division of opinion in the House is very clear: it is between abolishing smacking altogether and retaining the current reasonable chastisement defence.

5.15 pm

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): I speak in support of amendment No. 39, tabled in my name and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) and other hon. Members.

My journey on this issue reflects that of any other parent, I suspect, and of many members of the public. I have no great expertise in the matter, as some hon. Members do. The only expertise that I bring to the debate comes from my becoming the father of three children within three years—I have expertise in running myself ragged trying to keep up with their high levels of energy.

My journey on this issue has changed substantially. At one stage, I was completely opposed to the idea of any further controls or of a ban on smacking. Now, I feel that the mood of public opinion is moving firmly in the direction not only of greater controls but, eventually, a total ban. I also feel that that is probably the right thing to do. However, I have a degree of uncertainty about this because, as a parent, I am not yet wholly convinced, although I am nearly there.

Clause 56 is not ideal by any stretch of the imagination, but I recognise that it is a step in the right direction. It lacks simplicity and it is open to legal interpretation. It also lacks elegance, but so does much of our current law. If a ban is the right way forward— I am inclined to that way of thinking, but it is a big "if" in the public's mind at the moment—but the Government do not feel ready to introduce a ban today, let them at least commit themselves to a full, fundamental review two years after the commencement of the Bill, which has so many good things in it. Let them bring this issue back to the House so that we can debate it in full and consider the implications.

Mr. Dawson: Does my hon. Friend accept that all of us who propose a complete ban—now—on the physical punishment of children would very much want it to be developed in the context of parental support, parental education and parental information? There would be no question of simply imposing something without a great deal of work being done with parents.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. His point is well made and he will see that I shall cover that issue later. He will be aware of the well-known saying in politics that we cannot lead unless, when we look over our shoulder, people are still following. One of the problems that the Government face is that there is not a great big crowd in favour of a ban. People are following that route in increasing numbers, but they are not all there yet. I include myself among those who are not yet there, because I still have some doubts.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): On that issue, may I point out to my hon. Friend that when the Swedish Government took the decision that parents should not smack their children, most people there were against it? However, a survey was carried out a couple of years ago, after the ban had been in place for quite a few years, and only 6 per cent. of people wanted the right to smack their children. So let us take this step now, educate now, and get on with the process of improving the lives of our children.

Huw Irranca-Davies: One Labour Member has already remarked on the fact that this is an historic occasion. I agree, but it is not the only occasion. I know that my hon. Friend holds strong fundamental and principled views on this matter, which might well be right—that is what I am saying—but this should not be the only occasion on which we can revisit the issue. That is why I strongly support the amendment under which we would review the matter in full once we have seen whether clause 56 works. If it has not worked, we will have to go forward from that point.

Such a review would not be based only on international comparators—we have those already. It is a question not of what works in Sweden or other European countries, but of what will work in this country, with our historical attitudes, our parenting culture and our legal system. I for one would urge the Government to move ahead with the Bill because it contains so many good things for children. However, they should come back to the House, not lock the door on us, and give us the opportunity to debate this issue once again. While this might be a historic moment, it is not the one and only and we deserve another opportunity to review public opinion, parental opinion and Back-Bench opinion in two years' time.

Mr. Robathan: I wish to speak to the new clause and amendment No. 23. I hope that the House will divide on amendment No. 23 when it gets the opportunity.

I introduced a private Member's Bill four years ago, which I recall the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) opposed. I therefore re-examined my notes. I recall that in 1993, a judge had before him a mother of two appealing against a conviction for assault. She had spanked her child with a slipper having caught the child stealing. One may or may not agree with that, but she was convicted of assault—for those who say that people do not get charged and convicted, that is one case. The judge quashed the conviction, saying:

> "If a parent cannot slipper a child, the world is going potty".

I do not know whether the judge is still alive, but I suspect that he will think that many in the House are indeed going barking mad—[Interruption.] If there are Members who would like to leave the Chamber, they should do that instead of nattering.

A parent who harms a child should of course be charged and prosecuted. Many are not. Does anyone really believe that passing this law will mean that more parents who harm children will be prosecuted? I suspect that that will not be the case.

Mr. Dawson: Does not the hon. Gentleman understand that the proponents of a complete ban are trying to argue for a cultural change whereby the physical punishment or over-chastisement of children simply becomes unacceptable?

Mr. Robathan: The hon. Gentleman will know that I like and respect him, but that does not mean that I agree with him.

I am delighted that the hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. Pollard) and others can bring up their children without smacking them. I think that that is marvellous. I have two small children to whom I am devoted—I love them more than anything else in the world. Very occasionally, I smack them; much more often, I threaten them with it. Funnily enough, it works rather well.

I will talk briefly about violence in society. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) said that violence begets violence. Apparently, we now have 1 million violent crimes a year on our streets, children are carrying knives in schools and using them, teachers are being attacked in schools more and more often, and teachers tell me that when they try to remonstrate with children, they say, "You can't touch me." When we debated getting rid of corporal punishment in schools, we were told that it would mean less violence in schools. In fact, there is more. Members should therefore ask their constituents whether they think that the drive towards removing violence—smacking children and corporal punishment—has achieved much.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): In the instance that the hon. Gentleman, who is my near parliamentary neighbour, has given, is it not just as likely that increased violence between young people and by young people arises from the violence of the background that they may experience in their home, rather than from a lack of chastisement in school?

Mr. Robathan: I do not think that the evidence bears that out. I would say that the rise in violence is much more related to the drivel coming out of our television and video screens, but that is another matter for another debate at a later time.

Who cares more? Is it parents, is it social workers, is it the police or is it legislators? As a parent, I know who cares more: I care more. I suspect that if other Members ask their constituents who are parents the same question, they will hear the same answer.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robathan: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, who will never have children so he will approach the matter differently. [Interruption.]

Chris Bryant: I would have said that I was grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way.

Is not the truth of the matter that some parents—the vast majority—do care deeply about their children, but some do not? That is the problem that we must address.

Mr. Robathan: On that I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. He is quite right that some parents do not care. The question is whether abolishing all smacking will make them care more. I rather doubt it.

Who knows best? Is it the police, social workers or parents? Of course there are parents who harm their children, but they are, I suggest, a very small minority, and they should be prosecuted now.

Mr. Hogg: May I say to my hon. Friend—on behalf, I think, of his own party—that his remark to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) was uncalled for and deserves an apology?

Mr. Robathan: I will indeed apologise to the hon. Gentleman, although I do not like people preaching to others. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, and I might even buy him a drink afterwards. Perhaps it is to do with the excitement of the occasion.

Most loving parents are trying their best in very difficult circumstances and many do raise children with no smacking at all. I remember my brother telling me that he had no problem in this regard; perhaps it is only others who do—but how dare anyone tell loving parents, "We know best"?

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): My hon. Friend will know from his constituency experience—as will all Members—of the belief among our constituents that public authorities and the ruling elites, who are well represented on the Labour Benches, are not on their side. Is this not the key question? If the law is changed tonight, are our constituents more or less likely to believe that the ruling elites and the public authorities are on their side?

Mr. Robathan: That is an excellent point. We are talking about introducing the police and social services into the relationship between a child and his or her parents. At the very least, an interview with a police officer will cause some friction and tension between parents and children. At worst, it will lead—as it often has—to a child being taken into care.

There was a man called Frank Beck who ran care homes in Leicestershire. We should all know about the horror stories that emerged from those homes. Most social workers are trying their best in difficult circumstances and some are outstanding, but we know that not all of them are.

Mr. Shaun Woodward (St. Helens, South) (Lab): At the heart of these proposals is the fact that every week more than one child in this country dies as a result of parental physical abuse. We are not asking whether people in this country love their children more or less than those elsewhere in the world. The fact is that in Sweden, where smacking has been banned, no child has died as a result of parental physical abuse. What we are arguing about, surely, is how to prevent unnecessary and tragic deaths.

Mr. Robathan: I am not sure that banning smacking will lead to any more convictions of parents who abuse their children in this country. I understand that in Sweden smacking was abolished in 1979. Between 1981 and 1994 there was a fivefold increase in the number of child abuse cases and child-on-child assaults, which is interesting; but, more to the point, UNICEF states that the average number of deaths per 100,000 children over the past five years in Sweden is much greater than the United Kingdom average. We should go back to the statistics.

5.30 pm

I want to see a society where children are well disciplined. Part of self-discipline is being taught discipline by one's parents. I hope that that does not need smacking, but sometimes it does. Those who will vote to ban smacking are showing an extraordinary arrogance in saying, "I know best. I know better than loving parents." As my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) said, that shows a detachment from people in this country. We do not know better than most parents. We should not pretend that we do. Most parents can look after their children much better without the interference of legislators, the police or social services.

Julie Morgan: I support new clause 12. My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) has gone into many of the detailed arguments for the new clause. It is important that the law sends a clear message that hitting, smacking or any form of physical punishment by an adult to a child, who is smaller, weaker and vulnerable, is not acceptable. Hitting a child is humiliating for the child and for the adult involved.

I have looked into research that has been conducted in Wales by Save the Children about how children feel about being smacked. That research clearly shows that children do not view smacks as trivial and that the effects of a smack are deeply felt. They associate smacking with angry parents. Some of the older children said that they felt that the adults felt regret after they smacked a child. Children said that smacking usually takes place in the house and in other areas where no one can see. They felt that adults were ashamed of smacking their children.

Peter Clarke, the Children's Commissioner for Wales, says that young people have complained to him that they do not have the respect of adults. That is one of his main findings in the reports that have been published and the discussions that he has had with children since he became the commissioner. They feel that the main reason that they do not have such respect is that adults are allowed to hit them. As Peter Clarke said in his letter to the Prime Minister yesterday, urging him to support new clause 12:

> "As long as the smallest and most vulnerable members of society have less protection from assault than adults, the Government's position is at odds with the title of the Green Paper 'Every Child Matters'."

He goes on to say:

> "Smacking children is not only a breach of their human rights, but is linked to an outdated and ineffective approach to raising children."

Children should be afforded the same protection under the law as adults. It is unjust for one human being to be treated differently under the law on the basis of age alone. Children in Wales, the national umbrella organisation for children and young people, does not accept that smacks are mostly loving. It seems a contradiction in terms to say, "You can have a loving smack."

Mr. Heath: I would like to see a ban on abusive violence but am yet to be persuaded by new clause 12. Can the hon. Lady explain why subsection (2) introduces a new defence, which is available to people for smacking their children under certain circumstances? That seems to be out of kilter with the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) in introducing the new clause.

Julie Morgan: I have been consulting my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield because I am uncertain about the point that the hon. Gentleman is making. I am afraid that I cannot answer that point.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Subsection (2) takes account of the concern that we should not take action where, as I mentioned in my speech, a parent may be faced with a child consistently running into the road. I have done this with one of my children and I accept that I did it because I was concerned about danger. There will be exemptions. The law would not take action in such circumstances. Surely that is a common-sense approach.

Julie Morgan: I thank my hon. Friend for helping me out.

Child protection agencies say that smacking is often a result of loss of control by the adult. Children in Wales has concrete evidence of injuries to very young children where parents have felt justified in their actions because the defence of reasonable chastisement exists. By not removing that defence completely, we will feed into that justification.

I am also very concerned about clause 56, which should be removed. It allows parents to justify common assault as reasonable punishment; the message is, as the "Children are Unbeatable!" briefing tells us, "Carry on smacking."Many people have expressed concern about parents being criminalised, but as has been pointed out, the new clause is not about that; rather, it is about giving parents support and help with positive parenting. If it were accepted, it would be accompanied by a great deal of help, education and support; it cannot be introduced by itself overnight. There would be a change in climate and we would do all that we could to help and support parents. The message would be clear and the Government would be giving a clear lead on what is acceptable.

At the heart of all this is the question, "What is in the child's best interest?" and taking a parent to court will almost always not be in their best interest. The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) said that in Germany, where smacking was outlawed in 2000, it appears that no parents have been prosecuted since then. Early research suggests that there has already been a major shift in public opinion away from physical punishment. My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) drew our attention to Sweden, where public opinion has changed. A Government have to lead, and the evidence from other countries shows that on this issue, public opinion has followed.

This issue is also important for all those present who campaigned against domestic violence. When we campaigned in the 1970s, we were told that such legislation would be unworkable and that in any case, "She must have done something to deserve it." In the early days of Women's Aid, domestic violence was considered a trivial issue and we had to campaign to get it up the political agenda. Of course, there was also the question of not interfering in family life.

Sandra Osborne (Ayr) (Lab): I agree with my hon. Friend. Does she agree that given that we have achieved zero tolerance of violence against women, children deserve the same?

Julie Morgan: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. Our long experience of domestic violence issues has led us to a position of zero tolerance, and I am proud of the fact that only last week our Government introduced legislation on domestic violence.

David Taylor: Linking this issue back to the point made by the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), is it not true that children who are smacked and subjected to violence at home are much more likely to be aggressive towards their siblings, to bully other children, to get involved in antisocial behaviour, to be violent to their future spouses and to commit violent crime?

Julie Morgan: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention and I certainly agree with him.

Many of the arguments against the new clause that we have heard today we have been through before in other surroundings. Some people say that smacking does no harm, but there is evidence that it does. We are also told that such a provision would be unworkable.

Mrs. Betty Williams: Is my hon. Friend aware of the view of the Joint Committee on Human Rights on clause 56? It says that the clause "perpetuates the current uncertainty" about what constitutes reasonable chastisement, and that as such, rather than reducing unfair and unnecessary prosecutions, as the Government suggest, it will simply encourage them.

Julie Morgan: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention; I agree.

We have an opportunity to increase protection for children. It is up to us to take a lead in this field, to think of the many children who have died at the hands of parents or carers, and to think of the step that we can take today to help to protect them in future.

Miss Kirkbride: I shall be very brief. Following on from the comments of the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan), I should point out that those who support the new clause have not explained how banning the smacking of children and criminalising all parents will lead to a change in the number of tragic deaths of young children in the UK. There is simply no basis for the connection that has been made. People who are wicked enough to want to kill or sexually abuse a defenceless child are, in my opinion, beyond the realms of the law. No modest measure to say that all parents should not smack their children will influence their behaviour in any way. The case has not been made.

I would not want to smack my child, but I do not want to criminalise other parents who might believe that it is an appropriate way of dealing with their children. I ask Members to think about circumstances in a supermarket, for example, where a parent smacks a child who has just destroyed a display. What are the staff supposed to do—bring in the police, corral the parents or what? What will happen if a child is upset about being smacked in the home and calls the police? They often do not turn up for a burglary, so are they to turn up because a child has protested about being smacked by their parent? It makes a nonsense of the law and I implore hon. Members to vote against the proposals of the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe).

Tim Loughton: We have had an interesting debate and it is good to see the Chamber so full. What a shame that it was less full earlier for other parts of the Bill with equally important provisions.

As the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) said, this is a highly contentious issue. The fact is that we are all here because we care about children and none of us—whichever side of the argument we stand on smacking—wants to bring about more harm to children than already exists. All those who have supported the Children Bill want tougher measures against the perpetrators of violence, such as that against Victoria Climbié, and let us not forget the other 80 children a year on average who are harmed by it. More importantly, we want to prevent violence from happening in the first place and give protection and better life chances to looked-after children. We want to do all of that with as little intrusion as possible into the private lives of decent, hard-working, loving families.

This part of the Bill is a mess. I remind hon. Members that provisions on smacking were not in the original Bill and it is a shame that the issue has overshadowed coverage of the many important parts of this important Bill. In the Lords, the Liberal Democrat peer, Lord Lester, cobbled together this amendment to criminalise smacking, despite his own party's policy, which is to criminalise it altogether. In the Commons, the Liberal Democrats supported a motion and will be whipped to defeat the amendment of their fellow Liberal Democrat peer. Labour peers were allowed a free vote in the House of Lords as long as it was to vote against the outright ban amendment.

History is repeating itself in the Commons tonight. Here we have three choices. The first is to retain the Lester fudge or "middle way" amendment—

Mr. Heath rose—

Tim Loughton: I will not give way because I do not have time.

The second option is to vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Wakefield in favour of an outright ban. The third is to vote for the Isle of Wight amendment to return to the status quo. Only Conservative Members will decide the issue on the basis of a genuinely free vote this evening.

We already have a good child protection record in this country, despite some high-profile cases. According to the UNICEF figures provided by my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), we compare favourably in respect of the number of child deaths to other European countries, particularly Sweden. I am appalled at some of the speeches made in the debate and at some of the comments made outside the House, which suggest that a parent who in extremis smacks his or her child is only one step away from becoming a child abuser or killer—another Victoria Climbié case. That argument does not strengthen the case.

The Children Bill is designed to improve the protection of children yet further. There is no research to prove the causal link between moderate smacking administered by loving parents and violent effects on children. Suggesting otherwise is insulting to decent families trying to bring up their children in difficult circumstances.

As the right hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) said when he was a Health Minister,

> "The overwhelming majority of parents know the difference between smacking and beating. They know how to ensure good social behaviour in a loving and caring way."

Are we seriously suggesting that some parents get up each morning and pledge systematically to smack their child at least six times that day? It just does not happen like that.

Mr. Dawson rose—

Tim Loughton: I will not give way.

Smacking is a last resort if a child has failed to respond to anything else, especially if the child is causing harm to siblings or putting himself or others in danger.

How are we to judge the amendments before us today? I believe that there are four criteria: whether there is a significant body of support for change; whether the law is working well as it stands; whether the proposals are workable and proportionate and whether there will be knock-on effects; and, finally, whether the relationship between the state and families will be undermined. There is support for change. We have heard about all sorts of opinion polls, the latest of which, from MORI, suggested that 85 per cent. of parents say that we should allow smacking to continue. Interestingly, 40 per cent. of people said enforcing a ban on smacking would be a waste of police time, and only 12 per cent. said it should be illegal in all circumstances.

5.45 pm

When the Government carried out their own consultation back in 2001, the Minister for Industry and the Regions—then a Health Minister—found that 70 per cent. of the public opposed a change in the law. She said:

> "We do not believe that any further change to the law at this time would be appropriate. It would neither command widespread public support nor be capable of consistent enforcement."

The Prime Minister said:

> "Our position is that it is a matter of individual choice for parents and the Government believe that most parents accept and understand there is a difference between discipline and abuse."

I do not see that there is overwhelming pressure for change.

Is the law bust and do we need to fix it? Again, we have heard the figures: in the past three years, only 11 cases of reasonable chastisement have been pleaded in the courts, of which five brought acquittals. The Government themselves found that there was no improper use of the defence of reasonable chastisement. That is an important point. It is not as though there is a problem in the judicial system.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tim Loughton: May I go on to my third point about the workability and proportionality tests? Clause 56 and Lord Lester's amendment seem to have created an unholy alliance against them on the ground that they are unworkable; that includes children's charities, anti-smacking Members of Parliament and the police. The hon. Member for Wakefield cited the Association of Chief Police Officers. The "reddening of the skin" test is surely unworkable. What about children with sensitive skin, dermographia or medical conditions, and what about ethnic minority children? It would be a lawyers' paradise. The NSPCC says that clause 56 is likely to result in unfair and unnecessary prosecutions.

Let us remember another deficiency in the Lester amendment, which is the idea that a battery can be committed without the victim suffering any kind of injury. Thus, any touching can constitute battery. It need not necessarily involve a harming of the body, and that can be shown by the fact that a battery can take place even if the victim did not feel the touching. Is that not disproportionate? Are we really saying that parents who smack their children could be prosecuted with up to a five-year jail term, as is proposed under the new clause?

Surely any attempt to define smacking as a criminal offence or narrowly to define reasonable chastisement is fraught with difficulties. Scotland tried to do it, wanting to ban blows to the head, shaking, use of implements, and smacking for the under-twos. The Scots are now having to back-track. I have a good deal of sympathy with what they were trying to achieve, but are we not just creating an instruction manual for how to beat a child? Parents will be able to rush off to get the rule book to see what they are actually allowed to do.

Trying to define severity by codifying the law on, for example, the duration and frequency of a smack or the child's personal characteristics is fraught with problems. What about the psychological punishment being meted out? How do we gauge that? Surely we should rely on the existing law, which has at least five tests—the prosecution of cruelty, wounding, grievous bodily harm, actual bodily harm and common assault—that can be applied to parents who really do go over the top.

There will be a knock-on effect on professionals. The already stretched resources of police and social workers will be stretched yet further. Fear and confusion among parents will be exacerbated by the fact that the margin for error has greatly decreased and the custodial penalty massively increased—tenfold. A mother who makes a mistake about the precise interpretation of the law could face very serious consequences. If she commits actual bodily harm, the maximum penalty is five years in prison, but what is currently common assault has a maximum of six months in jail, and that is, in some cases, now to become actual bodily harm.

It will be extremely easy to make false allegations about parents under the Government's proposals. It will be easy to make a serious criminal allegation against the parent whose child slips and bruises himself by accident. Many loving parents already fear being unjustly accused by neighbours or social workers, and the new proposals will add to their concerns. Parents may even be afraid to present their children at a doctor's surgery if they have marks in case they are accused of child abuse.

The fourth and final test is whether the change would undermine family and children relationships. Will it promote undue intrusion by the state? Surely it will. It will mean undue intrusion by the state into the lives of decent, caring families who are trying to bring up their children as best they can, often in difficult circumstances. It is a legitimate concern that the changes proposed in the law would give rise to an unprecedented level of unnecessary and potentially damaging state intrusion where children are looked after well and are at no risk of abuse.

One wonders where it will all end. There are many things that parents do to and for their children that it would be quite inappropriate, if not illegal, to do to another adult. Why pick just on smacking? Perhaps soon it will become illegal for parents to send a child to his room—imposing incarceration on another human individual.

If the proposals fail to pass those four tests—I believe that they have so failed—the burden of proof that falls on the prosecution should be removed. The law should remain as it stands and we should return to the status quo. Those are the options before the House this evening. I know that Opposition Members will exercise their free vote in an intelligent manner and in the best interests of the welfare of children.

Margaret Hodge: I recognise the passionate feelings and views held by Members on both sides of the House and I appreciate that new clause 12 is an attempt to be constructive. However, the Government cannot support what amounts to an absolute ban on smacking.

The Government's position remains unchanged: it is vital that we protect children from violence and abuse. The House will know that one of the driving forces behind the creation of my post and the development of this Bill is our determination to strengthen the way that society safeguards and protects its children. That is why we took seriously the representations from the children's charities and others to the effect that the defence of reasonable chastisement was being misused by parents who were harming their children. It is also why we supported a free vote in the House of Lords on Lord Lester's amendment, which would have removed the defence of reasonable chastisement for acts of actual bodily harm, grievous bodily harm or cruelty. It is for that reason that Labour Members will be offered a free vote on the matter tonight.

I recognise that that does not go far enough for some hon. Members, who believe that the level of harm required by the offence is too great a threshold. However, actual bodily harm has been defined by the courts as any hurt or injury calculated to interfere with health or comfort. That seems to me to offer quite broad protection. Clause 56 provides additional protection for children and tightens the existing law. Some of the cases in which there was a misuse of the reasonable chastisement defence would no longer be able to use that as a legal defence.

It is nonsense and wrong to suggest that clause 56 would create a new loophole, or that it would legitimise acts of harm and abuse. It tightens the law but it does not change the standard of evidence needed to prove actual bodily harm or anything else, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) suggested.

Clause 56 provides additional protection for children but it does not criminalise parents for administering a light smack to their children. The Government are tightening up on a defence that was misused, but we are not creating a new offence, as to do so would be wrong. Actual bodily harm, grievous bodily harm and cruelty do not require that serious injury must be suffered. As the Attorney-General told the House of Lords, actual bodily harm is not confined to physical harm but can include psychological harm, for example.

The Director of Public Prosecutions is reviewing charging standards and the Government are toughening the law. At present, when a decision is being made about whether to pursue charges, no regard is given to children's physical strength and vulnerability. That is what the DPP is considering, and changes that have regard to those matters should be welcomed.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Margaret Hodge: No, because I do not have time.

[Margaret Hodge]

The Joint Committee on Human Rights has been critical of Government on this matter, but it recognised the positive impact of clause 56 when it said in its report that

> "the combination of the new clause and the new charging standard may well be considered sufficient to satisfy the UK's obligation to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in A v. UK, because it makes the defence unavailable in relation to treatment or punishment which is contrary to article 3."

It would be very odd, to say the least, if anyone who wanted to encourage parents to seek alternative forms of discipline voted to remove this clause.

I turn now to new clause 12, which the Government cannot support. All hon. Members believe that it is vital to strengthen the safeguarding and protection of children, but it would be wrong to create a new offence by imposing a ban on smacking. That would leave parents wondering whether a trivial smack could land them in prison. We cannot deal with the misuse of a defence by creating a new, inappropriate and ill-conceived offence. There is a world of difference between a light smack and violence or abuse. We should recognise that the vast majority of parents understand that difference and would never harm their children deliberately. Some people argue that minor smacks will not be prosecuted, but the new clause would make smacking a crime, so there is no guarantee that that will be the case. It is for Parliament to be clear and to make the law. We cannot expect the Crown Prosecution Service to pick and choose which crimes it does, or does not, prosecute in the light of a clear statement by Parliament that all smacking should be a criminal offence. The confusing gap between the effect of the new clause and the claims made by its proponents, as well as the fact that the Government simply do not believe that every single instance of parental smacking should be treated as a criminal offence, have led to our decision not to offer a free vote. No one decides lightly to smack a child, and most people feel bad and guilt-ridden about doing so. They believe that they have failed if they resort to smacking, but do hon. Members really believe that we can support good parenting by adding to those bad feelings by threatening the strong arm of the law? Is not a better way of changing the culture positively to encourage and support good parenting in the home? That is what our Sure Start programme aims to do, as do the children's fund, through many projects that it supports, and the parenting fund. We want to offer more support to good parents.

I turn to the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas), which was supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies). I recognise the reasoning of my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby in calling for a review of the effects of clause 56 once it has been in operation for two years. I agree wholeheartedly that when significant extra legal protection is introduced by the clause we should look closely at its practical effects. I am afraid, however, that her amendment does not meet its intended objective. None the less, I can give a clear commitment that two years after clause 56 comes into effect we will review the practical consequences of those changes to the law, and will also seek parents' views about smacking. We will lay a copy of the results before Parliament.

This important debate has rightly engendered much passion in all parts of the House. I understand and respect the sincerity and strength of the views of all hon. Members, but I urge them to consider that while we want to stop the misuse of a defence that could lead to children being harmed or abused—I believe that clause 56 achieves that aim—we do not want to be responsible for introducing a new offence that could criminalise thousands of parents throughout the country who are trying their hardest to do their best for their children. They love and cherish their children, and want to establish a framework of discipline while protecting them from harm and endeavouring to support their well-being. They try their hardest to get it right.

A total ban on smacking could criminalise most parents. That is surely not what we are about. Let us focus on the important job of safeguarding and protecting children who are in real danger of harm and abuse. Let us support parents in that most difficult and important job of bringing up their children. Let us legislate in a clear and practical way, which will properly benefit children and young people. I urge hon. Members to accept clause 56 and reject new clause 12.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Order for Third Reading read.

6.28 pm

Margaret Hodge: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

We are approaching the end of the Bill's passage through the House. It is a significant moment. I am pleased to reflect on a process in which there has been a great deal of constructive engagement from hon. Members of all parties who have brought their wide experience, intellect and attention to detail to our deliberations and the Bill has benefited greatly from that.

When the measure was introduced in the House of Lords in March, it was widely and warmly welcomed in and outside Parliament. Many people have waited a long time for the measure. The Bill has acted as a vehicle for important discussion of an exceptionally wide range of issues that are important to children's lives and the outcomes that they achieve. Throughout, there has been a wide consensus about the value and importance of the reforms that we are making. Baroness Howarth of Breckland came up with the catch phrase:

> "It is a small Bill with a large heart".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 30 March 2004; Vol. 659, c. 1287.]

It is slightly larger now and, thanks to this House and the other place, its heart beats even more strongly.

The Government's plans for the commissioner have been well tested during the parliamentary process, and I pay tribute to the parliamentarians and lobbyists who have campaigned for the creation of a commissioner for such a long time. The Government are confident that the Bill, enhanced by the amendments that the House has agreed today, is the best way forward. We will have a strong champion for children with a powerful, independent and manageable role, which will allow them to be an important voice on children's behalf. We intend the commissioner to be appointed early next year, and I am pleased to say that we are involving children and young people in the appointment process. My ministerial colleagues and I look forward to working with the commissioner.

Part 2 of the Bill contains a range of duties and powers for local agencies, which will establish clear lines of accountability for children's services and lead to better arrangements for safeguarding children and planning, commissioning and delivering services. I was pleased that the Standing Committee agreed a Government amendment to introduce the children and young people's planning requirement, which is an important rationalisation of the planning burdens on local authorities and which will be another lever to encourage more effective outcomes in planning, commissioning and delivering services.

The Bill allows us to set up universal information databases, which have attracted considerable attention. I repeat that those databases will in no way be a substitute for action, and I hope that they will provide a valuable tool to help practitioners work together better so that they can more easily identify children and meet their needs.

In response to parliamentary scrutiny, we have made some helpful amendments. The Bill now contains clear descriptions of the information that will be on the database and the agencies that may access it. Crucially, it includes the reassurance that the databases will not include details of case information.

Last week, we published our first consultation document on the difficult issues around the cause for concern and sensitive services. In developing the regulations and guidance, it will be important to respond to the issues raised by the consultation, to continue to learn from the work of the trailblazers and to take into account the issues and concerns that have been raised legitimately during the passage of the Bill. I am grateful to all hon. Members who have taken pains to ensure that we are aware of the importance of getting the Bill right and of the many things that we must avoid getting wrong.

We have spent a lot of time today debating aspects of the latter parts of the Bill, and hon. Members know that some significant improvements have been made. Today, we have introduced a power to establish a minimum fostering allowance, which is an important step that has been welcomed on both sides of the House. We have amended the Children Act 1989 to ensure that children's feelings, as well as their wishes, are taken into account when assessing their needs in a range of circumstances.

We have responded to hon. Members' concerns by enabling changes to be made to the rules of court, which will help us to represent our constituents without getting into contempt of court, and I am grateful for the work that has been done by my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General.

The passage of the Bill marks the beginning of the important programme of change for children to which the Government are committed. As I have said many times, the Bill provides a legislative framework, rather than all the answers, to improve outcomes for children.

Our purpose is to maximise opportunity and minimise risk; to enhance opportunity for every child; to work to close the gap between those who succeed and those who achieve less well; to make sure that every child matters; and to support our resolve to do all we can to prevent children such as Victoria Climbié from falling through the net and dying at the hands of adults in whose care they have been entrusted.

But it is what happens at the local level, on the ground, that will make a real difference to the lives of children, young people and their families. What will count is our work over the coming months and years with all those who provide services for children at the front line, from strategic agencies to individual practitioners. Our task is to build on the framework created by the Bill to reconfigure our services so that we shift our efforts to prevention while strengthening the safeguarding and protection of children; change services and organise them around the needs of the child, not of the professionals; and ensure that the voice of children and young people lies at the heart of all that we do.

This is a great Bill that will help us to create a step change for children. I commend it to the House.

6.36 pm

Tim Loughton: We are pleased to support the Bill that we are about to pass on Third Reading. That has been the case throughout, although we have had vigorous debates and remain concerned about some of the details.

[Tim Loughton]

We support the Bill in order to support vulnerable children and to promote the life chances of looked-after children, too many of whom are left behind. I hope that we can do that in a way that does not intrude too much into the private family lives of those many children who are fortunate enough not to be described as vulnerable. I also hope that we have added safeguards to the Bill in relation to the independence from Government of certain of the new systems that are being set up and ensuring a more joined-up approach by the professionals that is at the heart of what we need to achieve.

The Minister said that this is a great Bill. That may be slightly over-egging it, but it is a very important Bill. As Lord Laming said, it was wholly unacceptable that there had been some 40 predecessors to his report on Victoria Climbié in as many years. We were failing too many children, and the message from Lord Laming was that things must be different. All hon. Members who have participated in the passage of the Bill would subscribe to that.

The Committee could be described as the testimonial of the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson). He contributed to it with his usual well-informed demeanour and, when responding to me, cantankerousness. We respect and admire that, and we will miss him greatly when children's legislation comes before the House in future. I thank hon. Members on both sides of the Committee, particularly my hon. Friends, for their well-informed contributions.

Debate in Committee was sometimes fiery, particularly when the Minister talked about parental access. We saw that again today—fireworks from the Minister three days before Guy Fawkes night. However, the subject will not lie down. It is not a bandwagon on to which the Opposition have opportunistically climbed, but a very serious issue that is blighting the lives of too many decent parents around the country, and it deserves to be treated with rather more respect and seriousness than the Minister has shown in Committee and in this Chamber. Her comments may well come back to haunt her and will not be appreciated by many thousands of fathers and mothers who feel that they are being shut out of their children's lives.

I congratulate the Government on some of the later additions on foster allowances and look forward to the emergence of details on how that can become a practical reality. We sensed that the door was opening a tiny bit further in regard to a private fostering registration scheme, but we shall have to wait patiently for that. We particularly welcome the amendments that the Government accepted today on the wishes and feelings of children.

The Standing Committee was the first on which I had ever served in which I had my amendments hijacked. Quite a few that were accepted by the Government started off as Conservative amendments; mysteriously, the name of the Minister—or, today, the Secretary of State—then appeared on them. We are delighted that the Government have seen fit to support Conservative amendments, but it is slightly odd that they had to try to hijack them in that way.

There are certain outstanding problems in the Bill; we make no issue about that. The independence of the children's commissioner still needs to be proven, and the "big ears, no teeth" tag will still concern their lordships when the Bill returns to the upper House. The relationships between the English children's commissioner and those in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland will also present various problems that we shall have to review. One of my biggest concerns relates to the operation of the database. That provision still needs an awful lot more work and thinking out, because it represents a radical change to the way in which we account for our citizens, and many people will be concerned about its implications.

The structures that we have put in place in the Bill, the new people with titles, the tsars and the committees all sound very fine, but they will be as nothing unless there are well-trained professionals on the ground—social workers, teachers, school nurses, police officers and everyone else—who are properly informed, know what to look out for and work practically with each other to share that information safely in the interests of vulnerable children. The real test will not be what the Bill says but whether the people out there on the ground, whose job is to put it into action every day of the week, every week of the year, are able to do that; if, indeed, they are there to do it at all, because we still suffer from an enormous shortage of those dedicated people.

I was very pleased with our debate on promoting the educational achievement of looked-after children, which has been a scandal for far too long. We all agreed that it was a scandal, and that urgent action was required to address it. I hope that some of the practical measures in the Bill will begin to do so.

It is absolutely right that the Government should involve children as much as possible in making the provisions work. That is what the Bill is all about, and why we have all signed up to it. If it works, I hope that it will serve to re-engender some faith in the system among those children who have been left behind or left vulnerable for too long.

It is now four and a half years since the tragic, horrendous and unimaginable death of Victoria Climbié, but we should not forget that an average of 80 children suffer similarly at the hands of parents or carers each year without hitting the headlines. We need to reduce that figure, and we hope that the Bill will go some way towards achieving that. Lord Laming's report said that we needed to take urgent action now, and that his recommendations could not be > "deferred to some bright tomorrow."

That was absolutely right, and I hope that the Bill will represent an important step towards ensuring that this problem is addressed now. If it works, it will be a fitting tribute not only to Victoria Climbié but to all the other victims of horrendous abuse, whose abusers should never have been allowed to get away with what they did. We hope that they will not be allowed to do so in the future.

Mr. Dawson: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) for pointing out to the Whips that, although I have lost count of the number of times I have voted against the Government on the Bill, I have still been really nasty to the Opposition. I trust that that will ease my passage through the last few months of my dotage in the House of Commons, although I must point out that the Constitutional Affairs Committee inquiry into the family court system starts next week.

Despite my recent voting record, this is a good Bill, which presages a tremendous future for children in this country. I hope that it leads to a future of child-centred services, integrated services, co-operative services and, as the hon. Gentleman said, a future in which many more workers on the ground come together, are respected and valued for the work that they do, and are enthused and inspired by the Bill to produce even better work for children in the future.

In all of our discussions, we have all been guilty of tending to think of children as a great object of concern, while ignoring their dynamic and creative potential. We have had a great deal of discussion about the rights and wrongs of the children's commissioner. The Bill has been amended one way or the other, but I believe that it provides a huge opportunity for children and young people to take the commissioner and children's services wherever they will. We now have one person and, I presume, an office, who will be responsive to the agenda not of the Government or Parliament, but of children and young people. That will take children and young people—and eventually this whole country—in directions that perhaps we do not fully understand, as I believe that children and young people know things that we do not know, that they can engage with their peers in ways that we cannot, that they are the future of this country and that the experience of having a children's commissioner will allow them to lead and eventually take over the running of this country in directions at which we can only hint.

We have let the genie out of the bottle with this Bill, which is a good thing and a real achievement. In time, that may lead us all to say that this was a great Children Act.

Mrs. Brooke: We have been really pleased to be able to work on this legislation and, I hope, to contribute positively to the debate. It is always a matter of great pride to participate in making legislation that one believes can make a real difference—in this case, to children's lives.

Throughout consideration on this Bill, we have made much of the fact that we all need to listen to children. We cannot remind ourselves of that too often. Listening to children imposes on us the responsibility of not letting them down. Undoubtedly, we, collectively, have let many children down over the years. A core part of the Bill involving adults relates to the quality and quantity of staff and the training that is needed. Most importantly, if we are to learn the lessons of the past, we must achieve real multi-agency working and common practices, so that people are not compartmentalising and going home because they have done their bit, resulting in somebody being left out of the equation.

I welcome the amendment on wishes and feelings. The all-party children group, with the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson), arranged an excellent presentation not long ago in which we witnessed children's feelings. It was important to realise that children who might not be able to articulate their wishes could express anger, sorrow and so on. I congratulate the Minister yet again on introducing the minimum fostering allowance, which has been very important.

I want to express a few regrets. Are we really saying that every child matters if we still have asylum seekers' children in detention centres? We have children in prison. This very day, people are calling for a special inquiry into Joseph Scholes's death. We still have a lot to do, and it would have been good to reflect concern for those most vulnerable children in the Bill.

On a slightly different tack, I thank the Minister very much for writing to me about the proposed guardianship arrangements. I was extremely pleased to learn that the Government were in the early stages of reviewing existing arrangements for unaccompanied asylum-seeking children, to establish whether they needed to be changed. That was heartening, because we had said a lot about asylum seekers' children and it gave us a ray of hope.

We have had a great deal to say about the children's commissioner, and I am sure we will return to the subject when the Bill returns to this House. Obviously, we have concerns about new clause 12, but overall I agree with other Members that so much in the Bill is good that we want to express our support clearly and loudly.

I also want to thank everyone who served on the Committee, because it was a pleasant Committee on which to serve.

6.50 pm

Jonathan Shaw: What I hope we will gain from the Bill is a service that will look forward in assessing the difficulties and challenges involved in children's and parents' services. "Parents" is a word that is not mentioned often enough, and I would have preferred this to be called the Children and Parents Bill or the Children and Carers Bill.

The Bill looks forward to the shaping of children's and family services, rather than looking back. As the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) pointed out, all too often in the past inquiries have looked back on tragic events. Under the Bill there will be an annual report to Parliament, and those of us who are members of the Education and Skills Committee look forward to receiving it. There will be a robust exchange, and it will happen every year. In the past we have had to wait for inquiries on the cases of, for instance, Victoria Climbié, Maria Colwell and Jasmine Beckford.

Sterling work was clearly done in Committee. I congratulate members of the Standing Committee, and regret that I was not able to serve on it.

I am proud of the work that the Government have done on this and a range of other Bills. Since I entered the House in 1997, successive Bills relating to children have improved existing legislation and increased protection. Nevertheless, we need to focus our energies on helping parents with vulnerable children. It is the hard-to-reach parents whom we need to draw into the services that we want to provide. Often we start to engage such parents only in tragic circumstances, and sometimes they are forced to become involved through parenting orders. Research relating to such orders is positive, but we want parents to become engaged voluntarily rather than in a punitive context. Let us hope that the children's commissioner will concern himself not just with children but with the people with whom they spend most of their time—the people who shape their lives. Those people are, of course, their parents.

Hywel Williams: I pay tribute to all who have contributed to our debates on the Bill. We have had an interesting, enjoyable, occasionally funny and very challenging experience, and I am sure that I am a better man for it.

Let me make a serious point. It is our highest duty to ensure that children are better protected, and to enhance their lives. I think that the Bill will achieve that, although not to the extent that I had hoped. I know that other members of the Welsh Affairs Committee will share my disappointment about the Children's Commissioner for Wales, and that my hon. Friends who concerned themselves with clause 56 will agree that we shall have to return to issues that are important and will not go away.

There is, however, much to welcome in the Bill. I particularly welcome the measures relating to CAFCASS—the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service—in Wales, which are long overdue and have been demanded in the past by many Members, including me. I also welcome the changes to fostering allowances. I became involved in child care many years ago, when it was very difficult to recruit foster parents. I hope that this change will lead to better recruitment and better foster services.

Therefore, I welcome what is positive in the Bill. I want to make it clear that I am committed to revisiting those issues that I, my hon. Friends and other hon. Members think are important. The Bill is an opportunity to make a real change to children's lives. That is something that we can all be proud of.

6.55 pm

Julie Morgan: I want briefly to say how pleased I was to serve on the Committee that considered the Bill and how pleased I am to support the Bill on Third Reading. I had my differences with the Minister, particularly over the issues of physical chastisement and the relationship between the Welsh and English children's commissioners, but those subjects have had a good airing and, overall, I support the Bill strongly.

I want in particular to say how pleased I am that CAFCASS is transferring to Wales. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales and the Minister for Children, Young People and Families have put a lot of work into bringing that about. That will be a great step forward and it is welcomed by the work force in Wales. We did not have much debate about that because it is universally accepted.

Therefore, I am pleased to say that I support the Bill. I think that it will take the protection of children forward and I look forward to seeing its implementation in the years ahead.

6.56 pm

Mr. Roger Williams: I, too, congratulate the Minister on introducing a Bill that is accepted as a real improvement in terms of how children are looked after and welfare is promoted. Hon. Members from Wales have mentioned the devolution of CAFCASS to Wales. That issue has not had much coverage because the move has been universally welcomed. Although CAFCASS has had its difficulties in recent times, we all hope that, under the new leadership, it will be able to achieve the aspirations that many had when it was set up. The people who work for CAFCASS in Wales welcome the challenge of adapting it and ensuring that it is appropriate to the needs of children and families in Wales. Hugh Patrick, a constituent of mine with a long history of involvement in children's welfare issues, who is now a union representative for people working for CAFCASS, has assured me that staff are ready, willing and wanting to take up that challenge.

There have been disappointments. The Minister and I and other hon. Members have had our arguments over the role of the English and Welsh commissioners. The Select Committee on Welsh Affairs undertook considerable, lengthy pre-legislative scrutiny in good faith. It is disappointing that the Government could not accept the representations that we made, but I commend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales on the way in which he has made the present arrangements work. He has been instrumental in many cases, working with the commissioner in Wales, looking at his recommendations and taking them to other Ministers and Government Departments here. I assure him that we will want to make the arrangements, which we regard as inadequate, work well for children in Wales, too.

It is in that spirit that all hon. Members have taken part in the Standing Committee and in the debates on Report. We all commend the Bill and sincerely hope that there will be the great improvement in children's welfare that we all desire.

Margaret Hodge: I want to thank everyone, if I may. I thank our Committee Chairmen for the estimable way in which they chaired our proceedings, and all the members on both sides of the Committee for the positive contribution that they made. Even where we disagreed and had some debate, it was all in good spirit. I particularly thank my fellow Ministers, who are incredibly busy people, for the time they gave to supporting me during the proceedings on the Bill, and the Whip, my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Vernon Coaker), who played an estimable role in ensuring that we all kept to order. I also want to thank the many Back Benchers who served with us, some of whom spoke today. Others who were not called had, I know, prepared contributions to this important debate. I want to thank the parliamentary officials—

It being 7 o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour, pursuant to Order [this day].

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 3rd November—

(1) the Speaker shall put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motions relating to Members' Allowances, Parliamentary Pensions (Contributions Rate) and Parliamentary Pensions (Survivor Benefits and Early Retirement) not later than three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the first Motion, and such Questions shall include the Questions on any Amendments selected by the Speaker which may then be moved; and

(2) the Speaker shall put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motion in the name of Mr Peter Hain relating to Sessional Orders and Resolutions not later than Seven o'clock, or three hours after their commencement, whichever is the later; such Questions shall include the Questions on any Amendments selected by the Speaker which may then be moved; proceedings may continue after the moment of interruption; and the Orders of the House of 28th June 2001 and 6th November 2003 relating to Deferred Divisions shall not apply.—[Margaret Moran.]

Health Services (Gosport)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Margaret Moran.]

7 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): May I thank Mr. Speaker, through you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to raise this evening on the Floor of the House the issue of health care on the Gosport peninsula? The subject has been forced to the centre of our concerns in Gosport because of the Ministry of Defence's decision in December 1998 to close the Royal hospital Haslar, which is the only military hospital left in the United Kingdom. The local population greeted this decision with dismay and I proposed a rally and a march to the hospital—it involved 22,000 people—to express their view that the hospital should be retained.

The cause of the problem is that the MOD is seeking to disengage from hospital management, which is in stark contrast with the approach of Governments in other countries, who are building up—or at least maintaining—their defence medical services. Faced with a tremendous shortfall in key faculties in general surgery, anaesthetics, orthopaedic surgery and general medicine, the Government have taken the most peculiar decision to close the one remaining military hospital, at Haslar, and to develop a centre of military excellence elsewhere.

I maintain that in this area, more than any other, what we need is joined-up Government and the maintenance of links between the MOD and the national health service, but I am afraid that this Government have resolutely refused to provide that. In fact, although the Under-Secretary of State for Defence kindly invited me to his office, the purpose of the invitation was to tell me in clear terms that the MOD is absolutely determined to withdraw from Haslar not later than 31 March 2007. So, it is clear that the Government are determined to press ahead.

However, there is no doubt that Haslar hospital will be needed after March 2007, because the proposed development of Queen Alexandra hospital, Cosham, which is the subject of a private finance initiative bid, will not be completed by that date. Secondly, military medicine is still strong at Haslar and has much to offer in the context of the new hospital arrangements in south Hampshire, even after the development of Queen Alexandra hospital. Haslar still has 33 Field hospital. It has advanced telemedicine, a clinical measurement department, echocardiograms, cardiac systems and neurophysiological systems; such provision is not available at the proposed new location in Birmingham. If satisfactory arrangements can be made for the conjunction and joint use of Haslar with Queen Alexandra hospital, defence medicine would have a lot to gain and a lot to offer.

Military medicine is currently in a very sad state and there is a shortage in every specialty. The proposal was to move from Haslar to a new centre of defence medicine. At one point, the idea was jointly to involve Guy's and St. Thomas' hospitals in London. Then, the John Radcliffe hospital in Oxford was considered; indeed, Newcastle was also considered. Eventually, Birmingham was chosen and the decision was taken to spend £200 million on a new centre of defence medicine at Selly Oak hospital. Doing so would also allow military personnel to use the very good facilities at Birmingham university. Unfortunately, the Government ran out of money. The £200 million development was cancelled and, among other things, the admiral in charge of the project resigned from the Navy, rather than put through a project that he thought unworkable. Currently, armed forces personnel are left billeted out in twos and threes in small groups all around Birmingham. Some live in a YWCA hospital, some in a former hostel for the homeless. There is no real centre for defence medicine. The plans have collapsed, and so has the ethos of defence medical services.

The Ministry of Defence defiantly says that recruitment is satisfactory, but retention of trained doctors is at an abysmal level to the extent that the shortage of trained medical staff is a factor in troop deployment. We have to rely on other nations, particularly the Americans who, unlike us, give medical back-up a priority. If hospital and secondary care can be sorted out in Portsmouth and the Gosport peninsula, defence medicine could have a future in the south Hampshire area even now.

The civilian aspects, which are the main subject of my Adjournment debate this evening, are dominated by the construction of the new Queen Alexandra hospital at Corsham and the MOD's intention to close the Haslar hospital. The local population has consistently showed over the past six years complete determination in wanting Haslar to continue as a hospital providing local services. As a result of that determination, a consultation was undertaken by the Portsmouth and South East Hampshire health authority, which resulted in changes being announced in January 2000.

The announcement was as follows:

> "The new Haslar Accident Treatment Centre will replace the RH Haslar accident and emergency department. This will treat . . . an estimated 17,500 per year . . . It will open 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and will be staffed by emergency nurse practitioners."

It continued:

> "Day surgery will be provided on the Haslar site for many patients in good general health—an estimated 1,100 cases a year. The day surgery will include general surgery, orthopaedics, gynaecology and urology. Diagnostic services, including x-ray facilities, and investigations will be provided at Haslar. Outpatient clinics on the Gosport peninsula will be increased so that around 5,000 more patients a year than at present will be seen at either Haslar or Gosport War Memorial Hospital. It is expected that there will be more than 100 clinics a week in over 20 specialties."

That is an outline of the proposals advanced by the health authority in 2000. The Haslar taskforce, which I formed and have chaired from the beginning, reluctantly went along with those proposals, believing that it was the best that could reasonably be expected. We were somewhat reluctant to lose in-patients but felt that Haslar could at least survive as a major hospital and perhaps even expand in due course.

We formerly had a primary care trust both for Gosport and for Fareham, then a Fareham and Gosport PCT, and now a Fareham and Gosport PCT that shares its executive with an another PCT—not a happy scene. That PCT has now put forward two revised proposals, both of which involve having a community hospital at Fareham. The main difference between the two is that the first proposal has one key idea—the retention of the Haslar cross-link to provide various facilities, including an accident treatment centre, out-patients, physiotherapy and occupational therapy. The alternative proposal would have similar facilities, but provided at the Gosport War Memorial hospital. It would expand the Gosport health centre to provide an accident treatment centre, out-patients, minor surgery and more diagnostics. Both alternatives include the Fareham community hospital, but only one would retain Haslar with the other developing the Gosport War Memorial hospital.

Haslar is a major hospital. It is a former district general hospital equivalent and it deals with out-patients, has an accident treatment centre, a breast unit, 5,000 gastroenterology cases a year, a first-class X-ray department, including an magnetic resonance imaging scanner and ultra-sound. Its diagnostic and treatment centre is very successful, having succeeded in reducing waiting lists for operations in the area. It is a busy and successful hospital. Support for Haslar in the community has not wavered. People respect its superb facilities and its staff and they admire the way that nurses march at Haslar. It is a military hospital and it retains the ethos and spirit of the area, which has very much a military flavour in south Hampshire. Haslar is an outstandingly good hospital and people want it to be retained.

Gosport War Memorial hospital, on the other hand, is a former cottage hospital. When it was a cottage hospital, it was proposed that it should close, and we all campaigned to keep it open. While we did that—this shows how fashions change in medicine—it suddenly became fashionable to have a community hospital, so it was expanded to become one, and it is also much loved. However, it is a small hospital on a site that is already quite congested. Car parking is really quite difficult and it would not take further expansion.

The one thing that is not mentioned in the latest consultation document by the primary care trust—in the shorter version, certainly—is money. What I most fear is that the comparison between the two proposals will not be dealt with like for like, but handled entirely on the matter of money. The primary care trust, on advice, has concluded that for the Haslar alternative, economic assessment capital over 30 years would cost £93.038 million, risk adjusted, net present value—that is the way these things are assessed. The War Memorial hospital option would cost £75.318 million on the same basis. In capital terms, it is maintained that Haslar would cost £13 million, which would need to be paid to the Ministry of Defence, and £14.9 million in capital cost. The War Memorial hospital would cost £3.594 million, plus £2.6 million for replacing the health centre, where there might be some capital offset through a lift project. There would also be some £23.6 million for the community hospital at Fareham under both plans.

Where do we go from here? Hampshire county council's scrutiny committee, which is charged by statute to look at local plans, will meet on 26 November, and I look forward to being there to discuss the issue. The Fareham and Gosport primary care trust plans to make its final decision on 15 December.

I do not believe that those making the judgments are comparing like with like. Gosport War Memorial was a cottage hospital; it has been expanded and is a busy site, and it will not take further expansion. Car parking is a problem. Haslar is a large, airy, superb location. It is a former district general hospital. There is room for change and expansion. Excellent equipment is in place and it has the suites of operating facilities that will be needed. Portsmouth and South East Hampshire hospitals trust concluded in 2000, and again in 2002, that Haslar would be needed. We simply cannot believe that it will be possible to manage in future with fewer operating theatres and fewer beds. There is an absolute and widespread conviction that Haslar is needed, and my plea from Gosport is that consultation should be genuine. Our wish is to retain Haslar hospital, and I ask the Minister to support that proposal.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): I congratulate the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) on securing this debate on health services in the Gosport peninsula. Before I turn to the specific issues that he raised, I pay tribute to the work of all the staff in the Fareham and Gosport area and the role that they play in delivering quality services. All Members rightly attach the highest importance to national health service developments in their own constituencies. It is important that local people can have local access to high-quality health services. The hon. Gentleman is obviously demonstrating his interest in the subject by raising this debate.

I begin by looking at the context of this matter. Our NHS improvement plan set out a challenging 10-year programme for reform. As part of that, we want services to be accessible, flexible and designed around the needs of local patients. The policy of devolution gives local communities an opportunity to plan and develop health services according to their needs and demands and we have backed that up with significant funding.

Overall, there will be an average year-on-year increase in England of 7 per cent., over and above inflation. There will be an increase of £34 million in total budgets between 2003–04 and 2007–08, and more than 75 per cent. of that will go directly to PCTs. That means that we are putting resources in the hands of people in the front line of the NHS, alongside their responsibilities for developing and running services.

Fareham and Gosport PCT, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Gosport, will receive an increase in revenue allocation of £41 million between 2003–04 and 2005–06. That represents a cash increase of 30 per cent. However, to achieve our goal of modernising the NHS, many NHS economies and organisations are considering, with their local stakeholders, changes to the way in which they organise their services. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that hospital services need to change if we are to continue to fulfil patients' needs and improve access. Services cannot remain static forever, but must be responsive to local needs.

In Fareham and Gosport, work is already under way to plan health services fit for the future. Central to these plans is the major private finance initiative to which the hon. Gentleman referred. That scheme will mean a redevelopment of hospital services in Portsmouth, focusing on the current Queen Alexandra hospital site in Cosham. Once the new hospital is completed, all acute in-patient services will move there. It will be the main acute site for the whole of south-east Hampshire.

The rebuilding of the Queen Alexandra hospital and the reorganisation of its services mean that the local NHS has a unique opportunity to look afresh at what it does, and from where. As the hon. Gentleman noted, in October last year, the local PCT commenced a project to review the health needs of the local population and develop a strategy to provide services to meet those needs over the next five years and beyond. That work included a needs assessment, site feasibility studies, analysis of patient activity data and a bed census.

In March, as a result of that work, three broad options were offered for further consideration. They were discussed at various informal meetings, eight of which were held in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. In addition, five staff briefings were held.

The PCT is now undertaking a comprehensive and thorough consultation process that gives local people an opportunity to make their views known and to shape local health services. All that is in line with the Government's policy and principles, outlined in the document, "Keeping the NHS Local".

As the hon. Gentleman knows, two main proposals are being consulted on. He has gone through them already, so I shall not outline them again. However, the dispersed model provides new buildings for services when and where they need replacing, while the community hospitals model develops community hospitals as the hub of health services, in both Fareham and Gosport. Common to both models is the building of a new Fareham community hospital, and of new premises for an existing GP practice.

The hon. Gentleman raised concerns about the future of the Royal Hospital Haslar. I am aware that it has been a subject of discussion locally for many years. As he knows, the Ministry of Defence will vacate the hospital in 2007. The former Portsmouth and South East health authority gave a commitment in 2000, following public consultation, to develop a substantial facility at Haslar, subject to MOD agreement to the use of the site. The new hospital will offer day surgery, diagnostic and out-patient facilities, operative clinics and accident treatment.

That commitment was subsequently reiterated in a letter sent to the hon. Gentleman in January last year by my hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Hazel Blears), who is now Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety but who at the time was a Minister in the Department of Health. The local NHS has therefore been in discussions with the MOD about the potential use of part of the site for the provision of those services. The MOD identified two potential locations on the site of the Royal Hospital Haslar on which to develop a range of services—the crosslink block and the undeveloped area on the periphery of the site. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the latter option was excluded after public feedback this summer. The use of the crosslink block remains under public consultation, but the proposal brings with it, as he outlined, a substantial capital cost accruing from the purchase of the site and the necessary adaptations. The NHS has a duty to use public money wisely, and must therefore consider other options. The future of the Royal Hospital Haslar cannot be looked at in isolation, and the NHS has a responsibility to look at a range of options to ensure that primary and secondary services meet the needs of local patients and fit with wider plans for modernisation.

The precise configuration of services is under consultation, and we are in discussions on the matter. All the services currently provided by the Royal Hospital Haslar, including therapies, diagnostics and out-patient services, will still be provided locally, but the location of those services has yet to be decided. The NHS in Hampshire and the Isle of Wight remains committed to the pattern of services for the population of Gosport and Fareham agreed after the 2000 consultation, but their precise nature is under debate. It would be inappropriate to speculate about the outcome of the present consultation, which does not end formally until 8 November next week. Locally, the NHS has been in discussions with the MOD about the use of the site and I have already outlined the two options and their consequences. The arrangements for those discussions, as well as discussions with other partners, are the responsibility of a local partnership board, which will make sure that the quality and continuity of health services for the people of Gosport, Fareham and the south-east Hampshire area are not affected in the event of a delay, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned, in completing the redevelopment of the Queen Alexandra hospital in Cosham. The MOD has given assurances that sufficient time will be allowed for the Hampshire and Isle of Wight strategic health authority, the Portsmouth Hospitals NHS Trust and the Fareham and Gosport primary care trust to decide future requirements for the Haslar site and ensure that patients continue to receive the highest possible standard of health care over that period.

The hon. Gentleman spoke extensively about the role of the MOD, but he will understand that I can only comment from the perspective of the Department of Health. I was pleased to hear that he has had discussions with my colleagues in the MOD, even though I detected a note of frustration—the future of health services on the Gosport peninsula is obviously an issue of great concern to him. As I have mentioned, it is our policy that the local NHS should decide the priorities for the NHS locally, including decisions on the location of services. That is where specific local knowledge and expertise lies, and it is not appropriate for Ministers to decide on the direction of travel and how services should be configured, as we have made clear.

There is a discussion to be had about the relative merits of the different options with regard to the cost to the local economy. Money deployed on a more expensive option would mean less for other services. Local people need to have that discussion with the local health service. That process is going on, and the meeting on 15 December, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, is part of that. We have made it clear that it is best for that local knowledge and those local decisions to come into play through local decision making.

The health community in Fareham and Gosport has set out its proposals for change to a number of the key health services to improve the quality and the range of services for local people. That is an opportunity for local people to influence the debate by responding to the consultation. I hope that the hon. Gentleman continues to work with the local NHS to build a better future for residents in his area and that he urges local people to respond to the consultation so that they have a say in the provision of local health services.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-five minutes past Seven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Health Trusts

1. Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central) (Lab/Co-op): What discussions he has had with National Assembly for Wales Ministers concerning the effects of the Freedom of Information Act 2000 on the publication of data on individual health trusts in Wales. [194551]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have had no discussions with Assembly Ministers on the Freedom of Information Act in relation to the publication of data on individual health trusts, but I rather suspect that my hon. Friend has.

Mr. Jones: My constituent, Kelly Harris, contracted MRSA in the Heath hospital two months ago. Unfortunately, she has since had a toe amputated. For the past couple of months she has been trying to obtain information about her medical records, which the hospital has been reluctant to disclose. She is also trying to obtain information about the number of MRSA cases in the hospital, which she would have the right to do were it an English hospital. Does the Minister agree that not disclosing such information risks people believing either that Welsh people are too ignorant to interpret the data or that someone has something to hide?

Mr. Touhig: I express my sympathy for the ill health of my hon. Friend's constituent. The national public health service gathers and publishes data on health care-associated infections, including MRSA, in Wales. The information is not published in the same way as it is in England—it is anonymised—and it is for each individual trust to decide whether it wants to publish it. Given my hon. Friend's views, which other hon. Members will share, I will ensure that his comments are brought to the attention of my Assembly colleague, the Minister for Health and Social Services.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): I am glad that the Minister takes this matter seriously. Last year, NHS trust code D had 119 cases of MRSA. This year, it is estimated that 600 people will die from hospital-acquired infections in Wales. Even the Prime Minister has recognised that this is a problem. Keith Callaway of Bettws has twice suffered MRSA infections in hospital, and has lost his leg and suffered kidney failure and a cardiac arrest as a result. He said in The Western Mail that he is > "very bitter that this information is withheld" and that he

> "wholeheartedly believes that it should be made public."

I hope that the Minister will do a bit more than he outlined to make that happen.

Mr. Touhig: I fully understand the hon. Gentleman's point. As I said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones), his view is shared by Members on both sides of the House and I will ensure that it is brought to the attention of the health Minister in the Assembly.

Mr. Wiggin: I am glad that the Minister will bring the issue to his colleague's attention. However, the Assembly could do a great deal more. In 1996, there were 152 cases of MRSA; by 2001, there were 342. Last year, the figure reached 481. We need more than just pretty words from the Minister.

Mr. Touhig: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman thinks that I am just uttering pretty words, because I do take the matter seriously. I remind him that when his party was in power no figures on MRSA were published whatsoever.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): My colleague Kirsty Williams, the Assembly Member for Brecon and Radnorshire, has been instrumental in bringing this situation to light in the Assembly. Does the Minister agree that unless we have accurate figures about the prevalence of MRSA in Welsh hospitals we are unable properly to scrutinise the policies that are put forward by the Assembly to address the problem?

Mr. Touhig: I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's point. I am sure that he would agree that the Welsh Assembly is very transparent on a whole range of matters as regards giving information to the public. I share the concerns that hon. Members have expressed. I repeat that I will ensure that they are brought to the attention of the Assembly Minister.

Barnett Formula

2. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): What recent discussions he has had with the First Minister of the National Assembly for Wales on the impact of the Barnett formula on regeneration. [194552]

6. Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): What consultations he has had with the First Minister of the National Assembly for Wales on the effect of the Barnett formula on public expenditure in Wales in the next financial year. [194556]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I regularly meet the Assembly First Minister, and regeneration in Wales is one of the topics that we frequently discuss.

David Taylor: When I recently drove to Holyhead via the A55 along the north Wales coast, I was hugely impressed by the scale of regeneration since my last visit a decade ago. The Labour Government and the Labour Assembly have much of which to be proud. However, will the Secretary of State acknowledge the role of the generous Barnett formula in all this? Should not national grant distribution be more needs-based so that my own region does not lose out; or does the English midlands need to be categorised as Powys, East before we get a fairer deal?

Mr. Hain: That is an interesting proposition—I look forward to adding Red Leicester to the list of fine Welsh cheeses. If my hon. Friend wants to apply to the Gorsedd of the Bards, I shall put in a good word for him.

The Barnett formula is a population-based share that changes according to comparable spending in England, including in Leicestershire. It is therefore triggered by what goes on in England. Wales has a lot of catching up to do. We are making great progress, but gross domestic product per head remains 78.8 per cent. of the United Kingdom average. That is why the additional funding that the Labour Government are investing, compared with the miserable Tory record, is so important.

Kevin Brennan: I am sure that the soon-to-be defunct Wales Tourist Board will be glad to make a film about North-West Leicestershire called "Last Quango in Powys". Is not the fact that we shall have Barnett-plus in Wales for the next few years a warning to those who appear to believe that the answer to every problem in Wales is to throw the baby out with the Barnett formula?

Mr. Hain: Yes—I assume that my hon. Friend is talking about the nationalists, who have consistently attacked the Barnett formula. That is not surprising as they want Wales to be cut off from the rest of the United Kingdom. They ignore the fact that, uniquely, we have £555 million over the next three years over and above the Barnett formula for objective 1 funding. Yesterday, Sue Essex, the Minister for Finance, Local Government and Public Services in the Assembly, announced that some £13 million from the business rates incentive scheme would go towards reducing the impact of council tax rises, as part of an increase of £60 million-odd in the coming years. That is proof that the Labour Government are genuinely delivering for Wales all the way.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): As the representative for Powys, Central, may I tell the would-be Member for Powys, East that yesterday the Assembly Finance Minister announced a Welsh local government settlement? On all independent projections, that will mean a big increase in council tax as a result of the poor settlement for local government in the Budget, due to the inadequate formulation of the Barnett formula. Has the Secretary of State any plans to address that? If so, when can we expect a reformulation so that local government in Wales is not squeezed, although it has been so far?

Mr. Hain: I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome the additional money that the Labour Government in the Welsh Assembly announced yesterday to ensure that council tax rises are kept to a minimum, as they were this year. What would happen if the Liberal Democrat policy of massive hikes in income tax to replace the council tax were introduced? That would mean hard-working people, from police officers to nurses and teachers, paying a huge additional burden of income tax. That is the mad Lib Dem policy.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Not only the additional money but how it is spent is important to Wales. Will the Secretary of State hold discussions with the First Minister to ensure that more Barnett formula money is spent on attracting manufacturing investment into Wales, because thousands of jobs have been lost since the Government came to power? Is he not ashamed that there are fewer manufacturing jobs in Wales now than in 1997?

Mr. Hain: It is true that manufacturing has contracted in Wales as it has throughout the industrialised, modern world. It has happened elsewhere in Europe, in the United States and other places. The hon. Gentleman does not point out that employment in Wales is at record levels compared with a massive loss of manufacturing—around 100,000—and huge unemployment under Tory policies. Compared with that, we have a good record. We are doing more and more and the Welsh economy is strengthening week by week.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will recognise the scene that my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) described of travelling along the A55, and especially of the regeneration that has occurred in my constituency of Conwy since 1997. However, will my right hon. Friend take every opportunity to discuss with the First Minister and other agencies in Wales the effectiveness of flood defences, given the serious flooding in the past two weeks? Businesses and householders were badly affected, especially in the Bangor area.

Mr. Hain: I am aware of the problems of flooding in the Bangor area and throughout Wales, including in my constituency. I shall ensure that my hon. Friend's concerns are brought to the attention of the First Minister and therefore the Welsh Assembly Government. However, as she acknowledged, there has been record investment and more and more jobs in her constituency and along the north Wales corridor, to which my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) also referred. That is because Wales is working under Labour, compared with a Tory record of mass unemployment, mass bankruptcies and business collapse.

New Deal

3. Mrs. Jackie Lawrence (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with his Cabinet colleagues on the number of people who have benefited from the new deal in Wales. [194553]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I have regular discussions with Cabinet colleagues. The Government's new deal has helped to reduce unemployment in Wales, with more than 70,000 people finding work through the programme.

Mrs. Lawrence: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that there is no better example of the successful way in which Wales is working than the take-up of the new deal for lone parents? Will he tell the House what he feels the impact would be of the Tories' plans to scrap the new deal, particularly on lone parents in areas such as mine whose lives have been dramatically—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State may answer questions only on matters for which he is responsible.

Mr. Hain: I agree with my hon. Friend that the new deal has been a fantastic success right across Wales, with 35,000 young people, 19,900 lone parents and 7,400 disabled people securing new jobs through it. That is why it would be absolutely catastrophic if a policy were adopted to abolish the new deal, as has been advocated by the Tories and the Liberal Democrats.

Alan Howarth (Newport, East) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that thanks to the new deal, to successful education and training policies, to a business-friendly strategy by Newport city council and to the Government's good management of the economy, unemployment in Newport has halved since 1997—[Interruption.]

Mr. Hain: Yes is the answer to that question! May I take this opportunity to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend's work as the Member representing Newport, East? I want to acknowledge that it will be a loss for the House when he stands down at the end of this Parliament.

We have had a fantastic record of job creation under Labour, with both the Assembly and our Westminster Government working in partnership. Unemployment in Wales is now at its lowest for nearly 30 years, and at half the level that we inherited from the last Conservative Government.

Antisocial Behaviour

4. Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): What discussions he has had with Cabinet colleagues on tackling antisocial behaviour in Wales. [194554]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): My right hon. Friend and I have regular discussions with ministerial colleagues on matters affecting Wales. Over the past year, the police, community safety partnerships and others in Wales have increasingly used the wide range of powers put in place to tackle antisocial behaviour. Last week, Cardiff, Newport and Swansea were included among 50 new antisocial behaviour action areas.

Ian Lucas: One of the most successful innovations associated with antisocial behaviour is the introduction of alley gating, which has been introduced in Caia Park in my constituency and is very popular with my constituents. Unfortunately, however, the provisions introduced by the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000 have not yet been implemented by the Assembly, which is preventing a more rapid introduction of alley gating in Caia Park. Will my hon. Friend have discussions with the National Assembly for Wales to establish what steps it intends to take to introduce this legislation in Wales as soon as possible?

Mr. Touhig: I am aware of the success of the alley gating project in Caia Park in my hon. Friend's constituency—[Interruption.] I can say that with a straight face. Indeed, £250,000 has been set aside by my colleagues in the Assembly for such projects. I am also aware of my hon. Friend's concerns about the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. It is a matter for the Assembly to decide on the commencement of the relevant orders under that Act, but I will take up the points that he has raised with my colleague Minister there.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): In the week in which a 12-year-old girl in my constituency admitted in court that she had provided the drugs that killed a schoolboy, may I ask the Minister what steps are being taken under the antisocial behaviour initiatives to deal with illegal drug dealing on our streets? In particular, will he tell me what is going to come out of the Prime Minister's announcement last week about empowering local communities to take more steps in regard to the people whom they can identify as problematic in their area? What detailed discussions are going on with National Assembly Ministers about implementing these proposals?

Mr. Touhig: I very much regret the incident to which the hon. Gentleman referred. My colleagues in the Assembly have a proactive policy of funding and supporting drug agencies. Indeed, I spent a day with one agency, as a fly on the wall, observing the good work that it was doing. It is also important that investment is going into education, so that young people can be made aware of the dangers of using drugs. They are an awful blight on our society, both in the hon. Gentleman's rural constituency and in my urban constituency.

We must work together as community partnerships because this problem will not be solved by the police alone. The community has to be proactive. There was an incident in my constituency in which a drug pusher was trying to sell drugs to children in primary schools and the local community rose up, turned up outside the school and phoned the police to give them the person's car number. We must be vigilant in all that we do. We are working closely with our colleagues in this regard, and they have a good record to date.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): The antisocial behaviour measures that have been implemented throughout Wales have been welcomed by my constituents, although they would like more of them to be used in my area. Does my hon. Friend agree that equally important is having eyes and ears on the ground to implement these measures? In addition to the extra policing and the community support officers, will he join me in actively encouraging local authorities, including my own in Bridgend, to consider the use of community or neighbourhood wardens?

Mr. Touhig: My hon. Friend is right to refer to the effects of the antisocial behaviour orders. Indeed, 114 have been issued in Wales. I take his point about the community wardens, and in my own borough the new Labour-controlled council is introducing a scheme. What is important is that that supplements and supports the work being done by the police. It encourages the community to participate in combating antisocial behaviour problems. Often, wardens act as professional witnesses when the community or the public are afraid to come forward, perhaps as a result of witnessing antisocial behaviour. I commend the schemes and I hope that authorities across Wales look seriously at the work being done in Newport and the work we are now doing in Caerphilly.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): For ASBOs to work, people with them must not breach them. When I asked how many of the 114 issued in Wales had been breached, the Minister did not give me the figures for 2003. Bearing it in mind that it is now November 2004, why was that?

Mr. Touhig: I knew that I should have signed off that question yesterday. This is the latest information I have that I can give the hon. Gentleman. When there are further figures available and if he asks the question again, I will give him the most up-to-date figures I have.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): I am sure that my hon. Friend will have been as delighted as I was to witness the Damascene conversion of the Liberal Democrats, who now support that legislation. What can be done to encourage those who put political prejudice over the interests of the nation to see the error of their ways? How can he reach out to the recalcitrant and the opportunistic?

Mr. Touhig: There are many potential St. Pauls on the other side of the House. Indeed, the Liberal Democrat record is not a good one. Frankly, they have opposed at every level in the House legislation that we have put through to combat antisocial behaviour, yet—[Interruption.] Oh yes they have—yet in local constituencies they campaign on issues of antisocial behaviour. They want to deprive the police and local authorities of powers—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think my mistake was to call the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound).

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I very much welcome the fact that Cardiff has been chosen as one of the pilot areas to tackle antisocial behaviour. What does that means for the people in my constituency of Cardiff, North and, in particular, for the residents of Fishguard road in Llanishen, who are suffering due to rowdiness, graffiti and drunkenness from a very small group of young people?

Mr. Touhig: I would hope that the resources that will now go into the antisocial behaviour action areas in Cardiff, Newport and Swansea will improve the situation to which my hon. Friend refers. Resources and manpower will now be committed to tackling serious problems of antisocial behaviour in those communities. A minority of people are involved in such activity in our communities across Wales and it is important that the community work together with the police, the local authorities and other agencies to tackle it. It will not disappear overnight, but if we work together in partnership we will start to see the tide turn.

Police Numbers

5. Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): What discussions he has had with his Cabinet colleagues on the latest figures for police numbers in Wales. [194555]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): My right hon. Friend and I have regular discussions with ministerial colleagues on matters affecting Wales. In Wales, police strength at 31 August 2004 was at 7,414, which is an increase of more than 12 per cent. since 1997.

Mr. Havard: There has been significant improvement in police numbers, community support officers, the extension of community wardens in my constituency, the reopening of local police stations and so on, as well as a significant improvement in drug interdiction—all of which has all been possible because of extra funding. However, I do not want that episodic investment to remain exactly that and not be sustained. What will my hon. Friend do to ensure sustainability of that funding so that those improvements continue?

Mr. Touhig: Funding the police service remains a top priority of this Government. In 2004–05, total provision for policing in England and Wales was more than £10 billion: an increase of 4.2 per cent. Funding for the police service in England and Wales has increased by more than 30 per cent., or £2.3 billion, over the past four years. The Government will continue to put in the resources, unlike the Conservative party, with its Mickey Mouse fantasy figures, which wants to cut £1.6 billion from the Home Office budget and spend £1.3 billion more on police. Its figures do not add up.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): Yesterday, the Minister for Finance, Local Government and Public Services in Wales announced a 5 per cent. increase in funding for local authorities in Wales. On closer inspection, that turned out to be 4.8 per cent. Interestingly, however, the average for north Wales authorities is 3.8 per cent. Given that the North Wales police authority requires 7.4 per cent. to meet its commitments, will the Minister ensure that there will be a generous and substantial police grant to avoid substantial policing cuts and/or huge hikes in council tax?

Mr. Touhig: I am aware of the statement made by my Assembly colleague the Minister for Finance, Local Government and Public Services yesterday. The settlement is very good and should be welcomed across Wales. It confirms the commitment of this Government and our partners in the Assembly to invest in public services. Clearly, the funding of the police service is important, and we can be proud of our record. Certainly, as we move towards the next settlement, the voice of Wales will be made clear by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales in Cabinet and in bilateral discussions with ministerial colleagues. We are determined that the police service in Wales will have all the adequate resources that it needs.

Minimum Wage

7. Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth) (Lab): What discussions he has had with Cabinet colleagues on the impact in Wales of the recent changes in the minimum wage. [194557]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): Tens of thousands of low-paid workers stand to benefit from the increases to the national minimum wage in Wales in October, including for the first time young workers aged 16 and 17 who will receive £3 an hour.

Mr. Edwards: Will my right hon. Friend tell his Cabinet colleagues that as a result of the national minimum wage, the recent increase and the extension of the minimum wage to 16 and 17-year-olds, Wales is no longer known as the land of low pay? Does he agree that shop assistants, catering staff and those who work in care homes will always remember that the minimum wage was introduced by this Government and opposed by the Conservative party at every stage?

Mr. Hain: Certainly, that will be one of the points on which we campaign in Wales over the coming months. Labour introduced the minimum wage, Labour will increase—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. It is far too noisy, and too many conversations are going on.

Mr. Hain: Labour introduced the minimum wage, and we will continue to increase it in line with recommendations from the Low Pay Commission. At the same time, contrary to all the scare stories of the Tories, employment has increased in Wales to record levels, business activity is up and the economy is stronger, all with the minimum wage underpinning wages so that decent social standards apply.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Is the Secretary of State aware that the John Lewis Partnership, which is about to open a department store in Cardiff, has announced that the new national minimum wage rates will reduce the number of staff that it can employ? What does that mean for employment in Wales?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman's leader, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), said that 1 million jobs would be lost if we introduced the minimum wage: exactly the same scare stories that the hon. Gentleman is now repeating in respect of John Lewis in Cardiff.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): The introduction of the national minimum wage directly benefited more than 2,000 families in my constituency and, importantly, indirectly the business community in Ynys Môn. Will my right hon. Friend join me, and the Plaid Cymru strategist Eurfyl ap Gwilym in his comments in a leaked draft of the Plaid Cymru manifesto, in welcoming the beneficial effects of the minimum wage in Wales? Does he agree that the additional resources that are put into the minimum wage, and its extension to 16 and 17-year-olds, will further benefit economies across Wales?

Mr. Hain: First, I acknowledge my hon. Friend's excellent work in his constituency in promoting the minimum wage and helping people to get off benefits. That is the point—since the Labour Government came to power, we have seen 101,000 more people in jobs in Wales. The minimum wage alongside that encourages people to go into work, as it makes work pay and rewards people to a decent extent.

Welsh Language

8. Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): What discussions he has had regarding a new Welsh Language Act. [194558]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The Government continue to be supportive of the Welsh language. The Home Office recently announced that Welsh will be included on the first page of new passports issued to people in Wales from around the end of next year

Hywel Williams: Irrespective of the many complaints that I, among other Members, receive about Welsh language provision, when does the Secretary of State think it would be proper for the Government to review the workings of the Welsh Language Act 1993—this Government, that is, rather than the Cardiff Government?

Mr. Hain: I am proud of our record in promoting the Welsh language. More people are learning and speaking Welsh than has been the case for generations. I see that the hon. Gentleman acknowledges that.

Rhodri Williams, the former chairman of the Welsh Language Board, has rejected calls for a new Welsh Language Act. He said:

> "We have not supported calls for the new Welsh Language Act. We believe it is through persuasion that we can get companies to use the language. We can work together. The Welsh language is now healthier and in a better state than it has been for a very long time."

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that as well.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [195552] David Wright (Telford) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 3 November.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

I am sure that the whole House will join me in sending our warmest congratulations to President Karzai of Afghanistan. It was the first ever election for the Afghan people and a remarkable tribute to them and to the power of democracy. Like everyone else, I await the outcome of the other presidential election with interest.

David Wright: I can say with some confidence that I am sure the people of Telford, Pennsylvania will have voted for John Kerry last night. Unfortunately, most of their countrymen did not do the same. When my right hon. Friend calls President Bush in the next few hours to congratulate him, will he push him very hard on the middle east peace process?

The Prime Minister: I meant what I said a moment ago. We must await the outcome of the presidential election in the United States. I can tell my hon. Friend, however, that I believe that progress in the middle east, the democracy that now exists in Afghanistan and the democracy that is to come, I hope, in Iraq—those three things together—would be the single most significant contribution we could make to the reduction of terrorism and of the power of terrorists to recruit to their cause in the world. I assure my hon. Friend that I will do everything I possibly can to work with the President of the United States to secure that progress in the middle east.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): Has the Department for Culture, Media and Sport had discussions with foreign casino operators about relaxing the money-laundering rules?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that the Department has had discussions with everyone to do with the Gambling Bill, and I am sure that that is absolutely normal. It is what the Department would expect to do. As far as I am aware, there has been no discussion about how it will reduce taxes for casino owners or others. I also think that we should be able to discuss the rights and wrongs of the Bill without hearing utterly absurd allegations of interference with the public interest.

Mr. Howard: We should indeed, but we should also know whether such discussions have taken place. I am surprised that the Prime Minister did not answer that question. It is something that he should have known, given the widespread concern expressed by the police and others about the effects of the Gambling Bill on money laundering and organised crime.

I have here an email from a senior official at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport to the operators of the biggest casino in Las Vegas. It begins, helpfully,

> "Hello all. I am about to head out of the office until Sep 9th now so could I encourage you all not to send in letters for a bit".

It goes on:

> "For our work on Money Laundering directive No. 3, still interested in seeing estimates as to what the transactional limit would be. Also interested in any other material you feel we should see about this".

Does the Prime Minister accept that the Department has held discussions with the casino operators about relaxing the rules on money laundering?

The Prime Minister: I have not seen that particular email—of course I have not—but if the right hon. and learned Gentleman is trying to suggest that the DCMS has had corrupt conversations with people—[HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] It is utterly absurd. We have been conducting this consultation process on the Gambling Bill for several years. We had an independent report from Sir Alan Budd, and then two bouts of legislative scrutiny. We have taken the utmost care to try to get this regime right. Having initially supported all this, the Conservatives—with their usual lame opportunism—came along a few weeks ago when they realised that a media campaign was on, and tried to create scare stories. Even now, I suppose that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is trying to make accusations of corruption. I really think that that is pretty shoddy.

Mr. Howard: As usual, the Prime Minister has answered a question that I did not ask and failed to answer the question that I did ask. I ask him now to accept that the Government, and the DCMS in particular, have had discussions with foreign casino operators on relaxing the rules on money laundering. On Monday, these allegations were put to the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport. She said that they were "untrue". She went on to say:

> "Discussions on the money laundering directive are a matter for the Treasury".—[Official Report, 1 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 51.]

Is it not clear that what she told this House on Monday was completely wrong?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that that is clear at all; actually, it is not clear from what the right hon. and learned Gentleman read out from the email a moment or two ago. Of course there will be discussions with casino operators—and, indeed, with everybody—about the Bill's impact, but money laundering issues are, as my right hon. Friend said, a matter for the Treasury; that is absolutely clear. But what is the right hon. and learned Gentleman actually suggesting? Is he suggesting—if so, he might as well say it openly—that there have been corrupt discussions involving casino operators in order that we relax the rules on money laundering to let them launder money? It really is a completely absurd allegation.

The fact is that, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman well knows, 90 per cent. of this Bill is about regulating gambling better. It is true that we are allowing regional casinos to operate and removing the restriction on them, but there are also a whole series of new restrictions on gambling in this country. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport said very fairly the other day that she would listen to concerns raised from all parts of the House about this Bill, and we will. But for the right hon. and learned Gentleman, after a four-year process, to suddenly stand at the Dispatch Box and make such an allegation simply reflects on him.

Mr. Howard: Let me make crystal clear what I am suggesting. I am suggesting—indeed, I have demonstrated—that discussions have taken place on money laundering between the DCMS and the biggest casino operators in Las Vegas, and that the Secretary of State denied that in this House on Monday. We know that the Government have been offering concessions on money laundering to the operators of those casinos, and that the Secretary of State tried to cover it up. What is the Prime Minister going to do about it?

The Prime Minister: I am sorry, but I do not accept at all that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has somehow shown that concessions have been offered on money laundering to casino operators. It really is ridiculous of him to suggest such a thing. I could at least understand it if he were putting forward his opposition to the Bill on the basis of what it actually says, although he probably feels somewhat discomfited by the fact that, as I said, the Conservative party supported these measures until a few weeks ago. But to mount an allegation of such a serious nature on the basis of some email that he has picked up is utterly absurd.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh) (SDLP): The Prime Minister will know that Annetta Flanagan, one of the three young people taken hostage in Afghanistan, is a constituent of mine, and will be aware of the intense grief that her family and the community feel. As he continues to strive for her safe release, will he make it clear that no dogma, no creed and no political objective can justify her kidnapping, that of Margaret Hassan or that of anyone else? Will he agree that that humanitarian message would be much more powerful, effective and listened to were it not diminished by the number of innocent Iraqi women and children who have been killed to date, which cannot be justified by many people there—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: In respect of the first part of my hon. Friend's question, I agree entirely with him. In respect of the second part, we do not accept the figures released by The Lancet last week at all. The Iraqi Ministry of Health has put out figures for the six months up to October, which suggest just over 3,000 deaths, but that includes people who are either terrorists or insurgents and those who have been the victims of terrorist attack. We do everything we possibly can to limit civilian casualties, but when our troops and Iraqi forces come under fire, they have to return fire. The way to stop all civilian casualties in Iraq is for insurgents and terrorists to lay down their weapons, allow the elections to go ahead in January and allow Iraq to become a stable democracy.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): May I ask the Prime Minister about the other democratic decision that is bound to have preoccupied him this week, the north-east regional assembly referendum? Will he take the opportunity to urge voters there not to repeat the mistake that the Scots made back in 1979 by voting no to devolution, only to have to wait 20 years to see it established? Does he agree that, with only 24 hours to go, it is most important that north-east voters take the opportunity to go out and vote yes?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree entirely. Devolution has been shown to work in Scotland and in Wales and London-wide government has also been shown to work. The fact that the north-east assembly will be handling hundreds of millions of pounds of money will mean an actual reduction in the overall number of councils in the north-east. It is right to have devolution and decentralisation of power and I support that.

Mr. Kennedy: Staying on the subject of referendums, we would all agree that one of the lessons of the north-east campaign is that the more positive campaigning is done in advance, the better it is when the decision is reached. As all parties in the House are committed to a referendum at some point on the European Union proposed constitution, when is the Prime Minister himself going to get out, with cross-party support, and begin positively to make the case for that constitution?

The Prime Minister: I always do, not only when I am asked, but on any occasion when I can talk about it. It is entirely sensible that Europe changes its rules when there is a Europe of 25 members, which will become 30 over time. It is right to have a modern framework of rules for Europe, provided, as the new constitution makes clear, that we protect our own right to determine our tax rates, our foreign policy and our defence and retain our opt-in in relation to asylum and immigration. Provided all of that is correct, the people of this country will believe that it is right for us to be at the centre of Europe, not on its margins.

Q2. [195553] Andy King (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Lab): Many workers at Jaguar in Coventry who live in Rugby and Kenilworth are very angry at the way in which Ford has handled the future of the Browns Lane plant. The car industry plays a very important role in the growing strength of the west midlands economy. Can I ask my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor to continue to do everything possible to secure the long-term future of Jaguar in the west midlands?

The Prime Minister: First, in respect of the Browns Lane plant, my hon. Friend, who has been active on the issue, knows that we have spoken to the company and the unions, urging them to sit down and to try to work out a proper way forward. I understand the strength of feeling, especially as the work force feel that they were given assurances on the future of the plant. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has recently spoken again to the parties concerned. I am sure myself, however, that it is also important to press for assurances about the long-term future of Jaguar in the west midlands, and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): Will the Prime Minister please confirm that, so long as he remains Prime Minister, he will not abolish the earnings limit on employees' national insurance contributions?

The Prime Minister: We have absolutely no plans to do so.

Q3. [195554] Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): The Prime Minister will agree that antisocial behaviour needs to be tackled firmly. I believe that the measures announced this week for an extension of spot-fines will certainly help in that respect. Does he also agree that measures to tackle graffiti and to break up teen gangs, which have not been supported by all Members in the House, have been particularly successful? Can we look forward to more measures of that kind in future?

The Prime Minister: First, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that it has been important to add further offences to the fixed-penalty notice regime. Also, the antisocial behaviour legislation is working, and working well, as was obvious from last week's report. We need to make sure that that is used right across our communities. I am delighted to say that the Liberal Democrat spokesman on these issues recently said about ASBOs:

> "Having gone round the country I can't, hand on my heart, say these aren't a useful thing."

Unfortunately, the Liberal Democrats voted against all the measures in the Bill that introduced these provisions; we look for their conversion, one by one, on these matters.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): Why does the Prime Minister think that shoplifters should not get a criminal record?

The Prime Minister: There is no reason why shoplifters should not get a criminal record. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman is referring to fixed-penalty notices, it is important that we are able to levy such notices, but the full criminal law still applies.

Mr. Howard: Let us be clear about what is happening. As a result of a law passed by this Government that came into force on Monday, shoplifters will be punished by means of a fixed-penalty notice, such as applies to people parking on a double yellow line. Right? Shoplifters will no longer get a criminal record. Right? Shoplifters are being told that they can steal up to £200 worth of goods, and in exchange get a fixed-penalty notice of £80. Right? That means that they can take £200 and get fined £80. This week, the Government produced a charter for shoplifters. Is that what the Prime Minister meant when he talked about being tough on crime?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman gets worse. First, the fixed-penalty notice is not a substitute for the ordinary criminal offence. [[HON. MEMBERS: "It is."] No, it is not, as police officers are perfectly entitled to arrest the person involved and charge him under the law. However, if they decide—

Mr. Howard: Who?

The Prime Minister: The police officers. If they decide that they want to serve a fixed-penalty notice, they can do so. I remind the Leader of the Opposition that fixed-penalty notices have been welcomed by police right across the country. Fixed-penalty notices are not a substitute for the existing criminal law; they are in addition to it. Right?

Q4. [195555] Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): Whatever their views on Iraq, many of my constituents are anxious that British troops who are there at Christmas should have the best possible contact with their families. Does my right hon. Friend agree that something should be done about restoring the free post to troops in Iraq?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has been considering the strong representations on this matter that have come from all sides of this House. I am pleased to announce that, in the run-up to Christmas, the Ministry of Defence will help friends and relatives send postal packets free of charge from anywhere in the UK to all service personnel serving overseas. We will see what happens after that period, but Christmas is a special time, when our thoughts are with those who are deployed overseas. We wish to recognise the exceptional commitment made by our servicemen and women world wide.

Q5. [195556] Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): Is the Prime Minister aware that in much of east Sussex and Kent women with breast cancer are having to wait three months for radiotherapy, and that that wait is expected to rise to five months as a result of a shortage of radiotherapy equipment and operators? Is he aware that breast cancer is the second biggest killer among women who die of cancer, and that if it is not treated within five months there is a much higher risk that the cancer will return? Is it not completely unacceptable that people living with the physical, mental and emotional problems associated with cancer must wait so long for treatment that genuinely could determine whether they live or die?

The Prime Minister: It is, of course, absolutely unacceptable, which is why we have been taking action on it. Breast cancer services in the UK are certainly improving faster than anywhere in Europe, and are now a match for the very best in the world. I do not know about the situation in the hon. Gentleman's constituency or area, and I shall look into it. However, we have made a huge investment into cancer services and hired extra cancer consultants. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has brought in an extra 600,000 MRI scans. That shows that we are trying to deal with the radiology bottleneck in the treatment of all cancers, and we shall look to do more. Finally, I shall look into the specific circumstances in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, and write to him.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West) (Lab): We all welcome the successful outcome and process of the elections in Afghanistan, but will my right hon. Friend ensure that promised international development funds actually reach the newly elected President and his government, so that there is proper, local sustainable economic development both to tackle poverty in Afghanistan and to undermine the pernicious poppy cultivation that washes up as drug abuse in our communities?

The Prime Minister: I totally agree with my right hon. Friend. We are making efforts to ensure that the money gets through and, in forthcoming weeks, we shall announce a new programme on the eradication of the drugs trade in Afghanistan. After the fall of the Taliban, we have seen what will, I believe, be a temporary increase in the amount of poppy cultivation. We have to bring that back down again, but we must also make sure that the economic development of Afghanistan—there is growth of about 25 or 30 per cent. a year—is not distorted by people feeling that their only livelihood is in cultivation of the poppy. My right hon. Friend is absolutely right; we have to deal with the matter at an international level, and we will do so.

Q6. [195557] Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Is the Prime Minister aware of the concerns of local authorities such as mine about the growing problem of Travellers who buy or occupy land in rural areas and then flout the planning laws to build on it, resulting in a considerable amount of money and time being spent to rectify the problem through the courts? Will the Prime Minister intervene to ensure that local authorities are given the greatest powers possible to combat the problem and to protect local residents whose lives are made such a misery by that antisocial practice?

The Prime Minister: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman, and I have held discussions with hon. Members about it. My understanding is that we are actually giving local authorities greater powers to ensure that they can take immediate action in the courts, rather than having a drawn-out process that often means that buildings or dwellings are erected by Travellers before there has been a chance to take action. However, we are looking at the matter again to ensure that the powers are sufficiently tough. I know from my own constituency that the issue can be serious and I think that the combination of measures that we are taking will make a genuine difference. But I am looking at the issue myself and, on that, too, perhaps I can get back to the hon. Gentleman.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): Will the Prime Minister give the House an assurance that when the United States launches its bomb-into-submission policy on Falluja, our Army will not become involved in any way in what are collective punishments that indiscriminately kill innocent civilians?

The Prime Minister: I have to say to my hon. Friend that the situation is simple. There is a Government in Iraq who have been appointed by the UN; not, as some people say, by the US, but by the UN. There will be elections supervised by the UN in January. What we are saying to people in Falluja—this is from the Iraqi Government, never mind the multinational force—is, "Lay down your weapons, submit to the authority of that UN-appointed Government, participate in the election, and see from the election how much support you have". But what we and the Iraqi Government cannot allow is a situation where outside terrorists and others use Falluja as a base to mount operations and kill innocent civilians and our soldiers, who are doing a job blessed by the United Nations Security Council resolution. To describe that as collective punishment of Falluja is gross, if I may say so to my hon. Friend. The collective punishment that is being visited on people in Iraq is collective punishment by suicide bombers and people detonating vehicles and trying to stop the democratic process taking place; our job is to make sure that it does.

Q7. [195558] Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): May I draw the Prime Minister's attention to the case of a pensioner who lives on one of the islands in my constituency? She has poor eyesight, but is able to go to the post office every week to collect her pension. However, she and many other pensioners with poor eyesight will find it difficult, if not impossible, to work with Post Office card accounts, and to recognise the cheques that the Department for Work and Pensions plans to send through the post instead of pension books. Will the Prime Minister agree to keep pension books for pensioners who, owing to poor eyesight, are unable to work with the Post Office card account and for whom cheques are unsuitable?

The Prime Minister: My understanding is that the Post Office is working with the Royal National Institute of the Blind to make sure that the problem is overcome. It is obviously a problem for people who have impaired sight but, as I say, it is my understanding that discussions are now taking place between the Department for Work and Pensions and the RNIB to resolve it.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): I am sure that the Prime Minister welcomes the real impact that community wardens have had both north and south of the border, but will he do all he can to expand the system so that all communities benefit from this very positive scheme?

The Prime Minister: Clearly, if we keep the investment going in, we have the possibility over the next few years of having not just record numbers of police but supporting that with community support officers and neighbourhood wardens. I would like to see a situation in which every community that needs one has a community patrol, so that we are back with a visible, uniformed presence on our streets in our local communities. Where this is happening throughout the United Kingdom, it is having a major impact not just on crime itself but on the fear of crime.

Q8. [195559] Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): The Volcker inquiry into corruption at the United Nations during the oil-for-food scandal will not report for a number of years, by which time many of those implicated will have retired. Given the implications of that scandal for the urgently needed reform of the United Nations and the fact that money from the programme is subsidising the insurgency in Iraq that is threatening the lives of British servicemen and women and British civilians, why did the Prime Minister not raise the issue in any way with the Secretary-General during his visit to London a week ago?

The Prime Minister: We have, of course, raised this issue with the Secretary-General and the United Nations on previous occasions. It is a serious question. It will take some time to get to the bottom of what has happened but we, in particular, have a very firm belief, for very obvious reasons, that if the oil-for-food programme has been abused in any way, the people who have abused it should be held to account. I simply point out to the hon. Gentleman that these issues are also being raised by the UN high-level panel that the Secretary-General established a short time ago. That will report over the next few weeks, and there is a British representative on it. That will give us the additional protection to make sure that such things cannot happen in future.

Q9. [195560] Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): May I welcome the Prime Minister's assurance that, in conjunction with the President of the United States, he will be giving priority over the coming months to the middle east peace process? What can he do in practice to ensure that reality on the ground in the middle east reflects the theory of the road map? Part of that involves pressing for an end to suicide bombings—a point that he makes frequently—but will he also address the comments of Mr. Dov Weisglass, a senior adviser to Ariel Sharon, who said that disengagement from Gaza is not a furthering of the peace process but a freezing of it and that the agenda for a Palestinian state has been taken off Israel's agenda with the blessing of the President of the United States?

The Prime Minister: I have not seen those remarks and I would like to see the context before I commented on them specifically. My very clear view—I believe it is shared by President Bush and certainly by the international community—is that the disengagement plan from the Gaza is important. I welcome it; I applaud the fact that Prime Minister Sharon is proceeding with it. However, it is a first step and if it is used properly, it can help us to get back into a proper process of peace negotiations that lead to a final settlement based on the two-state solution; an Israel that is confident of its security and a viable Palestinian state. I do not know of any statements that contradict that, but that is the vision—the only vision in my view—that will bring a lasting peace to the middle east.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): Despite the fact that weapons of mass destruction have not been found in Iraq, the Prime Minister has always argued that a change of regime there was legitimate. The Foreign Secretary's secret and personal memo to the Prime Minister dated 25 March 2002 advised him:

> "Legally there are two potential elephant traps:
> (i) regime change per se is no justification for military action".

What exactly did the Prime Minister understand that to mean?

The Prime Minister: Let me repeat this again, as I have done many times in the House; I understood that to mean that the legal grounds had to be a breach of United Nations resolutions. That was precisely what the legal grounds were. I should point out that the Iraq survey group, which is prayed in aid by many people on the existence of readily deployable weapons, makes it absolutely clear that there were multiple breaches of United Nations resolutions. That is why the legal basis was not merely clear at the time; it is clear now and was actually adhered to.

Q10. [195561] Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Will the Prime Minister say that in any future pension strategy, a Labour Government will ensure that pensioners on the lowest incomes will see their incomes rise by more than 55p a week for a single pensioner and 5p a week for a pensioner couple, which is what the Scottish nationalists proposed yesterday?

The Prime Minister: I think I can safely say that I would absolutely deplore such a policy. I had not come across the proposal myself, but now that I have, I am shocked and outraged by it. It only goes to show what a bad idea it would be to vote for them.

Point of Order

12.31 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Could hon. Members leave the Chamber quietly?

Mr. Sheerman: I do not usually raise points of order on matters of House of Commons security, but one of my constituents received an invitation to a reception in the House on 9 November that looked like a written personal invitation from the Prime Minister. After doing a little research, I found that the reception was for Animal Defenders International. The invitation was sent to a large number of people with an advertisement saying:

> "WHIP ME BEAT ME KICK ME 9th November 2004. House of Commons."

Given the heightened security in the House, it seems to be quite irresponsible for a Member to book a room to host such an event, especially given that the invitation does not indicate the purpose of the meeting or who that Member is. The invitation has gone out to a large number of people throughout the country. Many have been taken in by it and thought that they had received an invitation from the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. Gentleman gives me the documents, I will ensure that the Serjeant at Arms investigates the matter and reports to me.

Sex Equality (Duties of Public Authorities)

12.32 pm

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): I beg to move,

> That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision in relation to public authorities for the further prevention of sex discrimination and for the promotion of equality of opportunity for men and women.

Such a duty to promote equality was introduced for race discrimination in the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000. The Audit Commission has since described that as the key driver for change to combat the discrimination that still exists against our black and ethnic minority communities. Likewise, the draft Disability Discrimination Bill also contains a positive duty on the public sector to promote equality—and rightly so. It is now time for the same advance to be made for women and men, and my Bill would accomplish that.

The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 outlaws discrimination between women and men in the workplace and in the provision of goods and services. It was pioneering legislation 28 years ago when the incomparable Barbara Castle put it on the statute book. Her vision and determination put Britain at the forefront of the battle for equal opportunities and key advances were made. However, the Act does not prevent discrimination from happening in the first place, but it provides redress and compensation to those who experience it after the event, so only those who are determined enough to endure the stresses and strains of a legal process, the threat of losing their job or the likelihood of incurring high legal costs get the chance of receiving recompense. Cases can take many years to resolve with the result that women are still sacked for being pregnant and men are penalised at work for taking on caring responsibilities. In Britain today, much illegal discrimination is left unchallenged and unchecked.

A positive duty to promote equality would address that problem by shifting the onus to end discrimination from the individuals who suffer it to the public bodies that provide vital services to all of us and employ many millions to deliver them. The duty to promote will close many of those practical loopholes in the law, and make the fight against unfairness and blighted life chances much more effective. Make no mistake, there is still much to do, as recent figures have confirmed that the pay gap between women and men is stubbornly persistent at 18 per cent. Pay in the public sector is generally better than in the private sector. For example, the gap stands at 13 per cent. in health care, but in banking and public relations it is a staggering 56 per cent., and is widening. The causes are well documented, and women's lack of access to bonuses, overtime and opportunities for promotion are significant factors. Child care and other caring responsibilities often leave women with little choice but to work part-time for pay and conditions that are inferior to those in the full-time labour market, which often leads to men having to work even longer hours to make up the family income. British men work the longest hours in Europe, which is clearly not good for family life.

At work, women are still concentrated overwhelmingly in low-paid occupations and can expect to retire after a lifetime of hard work on a pension income that is just over half that of their male counterparts. Once again, the situation is not improving. The Equal Opportunities Commission, which supports the Bill, recently conducted an inquiry into job segregation by gender, and looked at five sectors—construction, engineering, plumbing, information technology and child care. Four of those sectors have a mainly male work force and major skills shortages, and one has a largely female work force and low pay. The commission discovered that the Government's modern apprenticeship scheme has reinforced rather than challenged that gender segregation. There has been no increase in the number of women coming into the four male-dominated sectors in the past ten years. For example, women make up only 1 per cent. of people working in construction, yet only 1 per cent. of modern apprentices in construction are women. Eight per cent. of people working in engineering are women, yet only 6 per cent. of modern apprenticeships in engineering are held by women. In child care, despite the prospective creation of 150,000 new jobs, men are almost completely absent from the sector and pay remains very low. A man who wishes to pursue a career in child care is still considered mildly eccentric or much worse. Overall, 95 per cent. of apprenticeships in engineering and construction are held by men, who earn £115 a week. In social care, by contrast, 89 per cent. of apprenticeships are taken by women, who earn just £60 a week.

Once the positive duty to promote equality is enshrined in law it is inconceivable that the lack of progress in tacking job segregation would be allowed to continue, and the role of the modern apprenticeship scheme in reinforcing that segregation would end. Banishing gender job segregation would offer women more choices and higher earnings opportunities and would also address skill shortages and boost our economic efficiency. It would offer men more civilised choices about their work-life balance. The duty to promote can also be a lever to ensure that public services are redesigned to reflect the life experiences of women and men more effectively. For example, men are much less likely than women to visit their GPs in a timely fashion, and only go to the doctor when their illness is advanced. Primary health services need to be redesigned to encourage men to seek help earlier. Women, on the other hand, rely on public transport much more than men as they have less access to private cars. They also have different patterns of usage, and combine trips to the shops with journeys to take children to school or the childminder, as well as their own travel to work. That is a complex set of journeys, yet bus routes and ticketing are often designed for simple commuting from one place to another. I could provide many similar examples of the scope for improving the design and delivery of public services to meet the needs of women and men more effectively. That can only improve efficiency and value for money.

There are those who will argue that the positive duty to promote will just be a bureaucratic nightmare that will have no effect on improving fairness and efficiency. These criticisms are usually made by people who do not wish our equality laws to be effective or modernised. In reality, the introduction of a new requirement to promote equality in the public sector can be delivered as part of the core planning inside an organisation. It should lead to greater equity and a more effective use of existing resources. It need not introduce extra complexity or expense, or endless paper trails, but it should encourage strategic analysis that results in more user-focused provision. That will create public services that fit the shape of more people's lives and that offer people equal opportunities to benefit.

I believe that, in due course, it is only right to extend these positive duties to prevent discrimination and promote equality to the private sector too. There is no reason why the efficiency and equity gains that they deliver should not benefit the whole economy and all our population. The Bill could be a small part of a third term Labour agenda to simplify, harmonise and extend equality protection to all. That would make our law simpler to understand and use for employers, employees and service providers alike. It would make protection from illegal discrimination a reality for all, and it would finish the work so ably begun by Barbara Castle by extending and opportunity further than ever before.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): There is, of course, always a temptation when these worthy measures are brought before the House on these occasions for us to allow them to pass. Procedurally, you know as I do, Mr. Speaker, that measures brought to the House at this stage in the Session have no chance of reaching the statute book, for which I for one am grateful. There are occasions, however, on which I believe hon. Members should express a view when they think that the measure is ill-founded and ill-directed, as, sadly, I think this one is.

Although we always respect the motivation of hon. Members when they introduce such measures—I certainly respect the motivation of the hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle)—I believe that going too far in an area such as that with which the Bill deals can be just as damaging as not going far enough. For example, I was struck by her comment early in her speech that much illegal discrimination goes unchallenged. I think that she was referring to the existing law and suggesting that it was perhaps not being used to the full. I immediately wondered whose fault it was that such discrimination went unchallenged. In my view, one of the main duties of a trade union, for example, should surely be to use every opportunity under existing law to represent its members, be they male, female or whatever, in the context of the very law that she praised so highly.

If the hon. Lady is saying that much illegal discrimination is unchallenged, I ask her—and this applies to so much new legislation that is brought before the House—why we should not concentrate on using existing legislation more effectively before seeking to introduce yet more. That is a matter of important general principle, and I doubt very much from what she said whether she has spent quite enough time considering whether existing legislation is being explored to the full, not least by the trade unions, before seeking to introduce yet further measures of the sort that she is talking about.

The worrying thing is that the hon. Lady and her Government would be the first to say that, in the context of historically low unemployment in this country, which I applaud, and the fact that this country has one of the highest proportions of women in work in the western world, any measure that even risks diminishing those conditions could be highly counterproductive. There is always a risk that, if well-intentioned measures such as the Bill are carried too far and reach too far into the workplace, they could start to have a counterproductive effect. That danger cannot be over-stated.

We are familiar with the phenomenon by which a quango set up under previous well-meaning legislation uses the resources given to it further to justify its existence and to extend its remit, which is a natural thing for people in quangos to do and we see it all the time. However, simply because a well-funded quango says, "We have discovered more things to do," or, even worse, "Another new quango should be set up," does not mean that we should say, "That's all right then." That is one of the weakest parts of the hon. Lady's argument.

The hon. Lady went on to make an interesting case about apprenticeships. She said that far too few women avail themselves of apprenticeships in engineering and that too few men work in child care—I do not know how one arrives at "too few" in that context. I do not know whether the hon. Lady expects an equal number of men and women to enter engineering apprenticeships and child care, or whether the number of women on engineering apprenticeships is not quite enough to satisfy her.

Leaving that matter to one side, how can one intervene in the structure and running of apprenticeships in order to change that balance? Such arguments always miss that point. It is easy to say, "There are too few women in engineering apprenticeships." I am intrigued to know the mechanism by which the number of women in engineering apprenticeships, or indeed the number of men in child care, would be increased. It is not good enough to state the problem and then assume that the solution will be made available.

Even more intriguingly, the hon. Lady went on to discuss lifestyle changes, which sound very trendy. Were the legislation to reach the statute book, it would allow some sort of quango to intervene in transport and many other arrangements in order to fulfil the requirements set out in hon. Lady's motion. Again, we must be careful before we go too far in that direction. It is difficult enough to improve our public transport arrangements, whether tubes, buses or railways, without the nightmarish thought that some well-meaning quango will say, "We have identified some necessary lifestyle changes in the population. We think that our railways should run differently and that our buses should run on different routes in order to try to improve people's lifestyles."

The resolution is far reaching and ambitious. It has the potential to reach into all aspects of employment, the public sector, transport and many other areas. As for the duty to promote—I pick out that phrase because the hon. Lady stressed it—she did not give any details, perhaps because of lack of time, on how it would bear on employers and the workplace. The phrase is easy to deploy and sounds attractive, if it is said fairly quickly, but when one starts to examine the implications and ramifications of a duty to promote, which would no doubt be policed by a quango, reaching out into the workplace and interfering yet further in relationships between managers and the managed, one sees scope for severe disruption of the employment process, of which the Government are rightly so proud.

I urge the hon. Lady to think again about the implications of what she is suggesting. Such measures are always well motivated, but the implications and the adverse effect on the workplace are extremely worrying. If the hon. Lady is not prepared to do the decent thing and withdraw her proposal, I hope that the House, having given the matter careful consideration, will say, perhaps with regret, that it is not persuaded that the measure, radical and far reaching as it is, is remotely justified and should therefore not proceed.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 23 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Angela Eagle, Vera Baird, Mr. Roger Berry, Mr. John Grogan, Helen Jackson, Ann McKechin, Mrs. Barbara Roche, Joan Ruddock, Mr. Shaun Woodward and Mr. Parmjit Dhanda.

SEX EQUALITY (DUTIES OF PUBLIC AUTHORITIES) BILL

Angela Eagle accordingly presented a Bill to make provision in relation to public authorities for the further prevention of sex discrimination and for the promotion of equality of opportunity for men and women: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 19 November, and to be printed [Bill 172].

Members' Allowances

Mr. Speaker: We now have three hours for the motion on Members' allowances and the two motions on parliamentary pensions. At the conclusion of the three-hour debate, I shall call the amendments to the Members' allowances motion that I have selected to be moved formally; the House will vote on each in turn and then on the main motion on Members' allowances, amended or not, as the case may be. We shall then vote on the two motions on pensions.

My selection of amendments has been posted in the No Lobby in the usual way.

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): I beg to move,

(1) That this House notes the recommendations made in Chapter 4 of the report of the Review Body on Senior Salaries on parliamentary pay and allowances (Cm 6354-I) a copy of which was laid before this House on 21st October; and is of the opinion that the provisions set out in paragraphs (2) to (5) below should be implemented, subject to any decisions of the Members Estimate Committee with regard to their application.

Staffing Allowance

(2) With effect from 1st April 2005, the Staffing Allowance should be increased to a base level of £72,000, rising to a maximum of £80,460, according to the number of full-time equivalent employees funded from the Staffing Allowance and based in London; and these sums should be adjusted on 1st April each year (beginning on 1st April 2005) in line with the Average Earnings Index for public and private sectors combined.

IT Provision

(3) With effect from the beginning of the next Parliament, the level of provision of IT equipment and support should be increased in line with recommendations 11 and 12 of the Review Body's report (Cm 6354-I).

London Supplement

(4) With effect from 1st April 2005, the London Supplement should be increased to £2,500, and this sum should be adjusted on 1st April each year (beginning on 1st April 2005) in line with the Average Earnings Index for public and private sectors combined; and it should not be payable to any Member who receives the Additional Costs Allowance.

Car Mileage Allowance and Parking

(5) With effect from 1st April 2005, the Car Mileage Allowance should be payable at the same rate as the car mileage rates approved by the Inland Revenue, with the higher rate payable up to a total of 10,000 miles and the lower rate thereafter or as determined in future by the Inland Revenue; and the cost of parking a car, motorcycle or bicycle, if wholly, exclusively and necessarily incurred in the performance of parliamentary duties, should be reimbursed.

Incidental Expenses Provision

(6) That recommendation 8 of the Review Body's report (Cm 6354-I) be referred to the House of Commons Members Estimate Committee for further consideration.

We have three motions before us this afternoon, the first of which is on Members' allowances, the second and third on parliamentary pensions. Explanatory memorandums on each have been placed in the Vote Office. All three are tabled in response to the report of the Review Body on Senior Salaries—the SSRB's triennial review of pay and allowances, a copy of which was laid before the House on 21 October. The Government are grateful to the SSRB for undertaking the review with its customary thoroughness and expertise. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House join me in thanking John Baker and his team for their hard work.

Let me say a word or two about the status of the SSRB. It is an independent organisation. That the Government, as a matter of principle, put its recommendations to the House is established practice. We ask the SSRB to study specific matters and it makes a recommendation, and it is to our advantage that we take outside and independent advice. I know that the whole House shares that view.

I emphasise that we are not debating Members' pay this afternoon. The SSRB recommended no increase in Members' or Ministers' salaries beyond the normal annual uprating in line with inflation. Personally, I think that that is right. Members' allowances have been the subject of some attention recently. It is understandable that some of the media and our constituents question whether the considerable sum spent on Members' allowances is well spent, but contrary to the lurid headlines, the allowances do not go to line our own pockets: they are essential if we are to function as effective Members of Parliament both at Westminster and in our constituencies, and all claims are within agreed rules.

The position today is very different from the one 20 or 30 years ago, when many Members lived in London, went to their constituency perhaps once a month for the odd surgery, and did not have a constituency office. Our constituents demand a different level of service and it is proper that the House has put in place the resources necessary to support that.

There are five effective parts to the motion. I shall deal with the amendments that you have selected, Mr. Speaker—(g), (h), (c) and (i)—during my opening remarks, if that is convenient. Paragraph (2) is applicable to the staffing allowance. It would implement recommendation 5 of the SSRB's report so that, with effect from 1 April 2005, the staffing allowance will be increased to a base of £72,000, rising to a maximum of £80,460 according to the number of full-time equivalent employees funded from the staffing allowance and based in London. Those sums will be adjusted annually in line with the average earnings index. The purpose is to enable Members to employ three full-time equivalent staff at proper rates of pay and to take account of the increased cost of employing staff in London.

I hope that the House will support the change. The SSRB based its recommendations on extensive analysis of pay rates in comparable jobs in London and outside. Although we must be careful with public money, we must pay our staff a decent rate for the job.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): In reference to paragraphs (2) and (6), what does the right hon. Gentleman think is the reasonable minimum number of secretaries that a Member of Parliament should be able to employ in the Palace of Westminster without penalties?

Mr. Hain: That is a very complicated question and difficult to answer with a simple yes or no. The reason I hesitate to respond is that each Member allocates staff and determines the precise arrangements according to his or her own needs and choices, and I think that that is an important right shared by all of us.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald) (Con): I am grateful to the Leader of the House for giving way again so quickly. He did not answer the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for West Worcestershire (Sir Michael Spicer), but will he answer mine? Does he agree that whether we base our staff in our constituency or at Westminster is a matter for each Member to determine and that the system should be neutral between the two decisions?

Mr. Hain: I am not sure that I accept the right hon. Lady's point about neutrality, because Members who base all their staff at Westminster do not pay rents and get free heat, lighting, use of the telephone and photocopying, and so on, whereas those of us who have constituency offices—the vast majority, including the right hon. Lady—incur costs there. However, one of the reasons why the motion refers the SSRB recommendation to the Members Estimate Committee, as the SSRB anticipated it might be, is that we would get into a difficult position if there were, in effect, a massive disincentive to having staff employed within the Palace or on the parliamentary estate. We are parliamentarians as well as constituency MPs, and that is an important principle to maintain.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree, however, that in the light of the fact that the expenses and allowances paid to Members are now published, they should be equally and easily understood and able to be judged? Giving different allowances—taking £7,000 off a Member and making extra provision if a Member employs all his or her staff in London—adds to the complexity of already complex rules. Should we not be creating a simpler, more straightforward system that is easy to understand and easily accounted for?

Mr. Hain: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. He has gone into the matter in considerable detail. There are enormous benefits in simplicity; on the other hand, the decision that the House took to establish two separate sources of allowance—the staffing allowance and the incidental expenses allowance, which overwhelmingly is directed toward constituency offices, although it can be used for other purposes—had the advantage of ensuring that our employees would not have to compete constantly against demands to buy a computer, or to pay a constituency office bill. We have an obligation to our employees to ensure that they have decent conditions.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Does the Leader of the House share my concern that the proposal on the incidental expenses provision, which the SSRB no doubt made in good faith, is extremely complicated? If the Members Estimate Committee accepts the recommendation, there will, in effect, be four levels of IEP for new Members starting after the general election, and a transitional arrangement with four different levels of IEP applicable to existing Members. Is there not at least the possibility of coming up with a simpler method of dealing with the problem of providing a little extra help to Members who have their offices outside London?

Mr. Hain: Yes, there is a simpler way—it is described on the Order Paper. On the other hand—the hon. Gentleman and I share common concerns on this, and I shall come on to it in some detail later—the enormous pressure on the parliamentary estate means that we have many different interests to reconcile. The SSRB tried to do that, but recognised that it would involve practical implications beyond its remit. We referred the proposal on the IEP to the Members Estimate Committee so that it could address precisely these issues. It is not the SSRB's fault, but the proposal that came to us had certain rigidities that could have had all sorts of anomalous effects. It is very important that proper consideration be given to that.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): The question of pressure on the parliamentary state is certainly outside the SSRB's terms of reference. According to paragraph 4.43 of its report,

> "The House authorities wish to encourage MPs to locate their office staff in the constituency."

Who are these House authorities—the men in wigs and tights? They take their authority from Members, and Members have never said that they want that.

Mr. Hain: I appreciate my right hon. Friend's passion, but the House authorities provide an extremely valuable service for us all in the variety of different functions that they undertake. They have a responsibility to inform the SSRB about a variety of issues affecting the parliamentary estate, including the enormous pressure on it.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend recognise that the proposals in the report would seriously affect those of us who are outer-London MPs with a constituency office and staff in the House of Commons, as well as a huge amount of immigration and asylum casework? I would have either to sack one of my members of staff or to close down my constituency office.

Mr. Hain: That is why the motion refers the matter to the Members Estimate Committee, where several such issues will be discussed.

The purpose of my bringing before the House a series of proposals on how allowances should be structured is to allow the House to decide on them. It is for the SSRB to recommend, but for the House to make the decisions.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): What surprises many of us is not that the recommendations came about but that none of us were consulted. I should have thought that consultation of Members of Parliament on their office costs and where they want to locate their staff would have been undertaken before proposals were brought to the House. That would be done in even the most primitive organisation.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend clearly has strong feelings, as have many Members on both sides of the House. I understand that. However, it is not true to say that Members were not consulted. Everybody knew that the SSRB inquiry was going on and anybody could have submitted evidence. At the back of the report there is a list of those who did so. The Speaker's Advisory Panel, which consists of Members of this House, was consulted. The proposal did not come out of thin air. It would not be right to criticise the SSRB, which has done a very professional job in the circumstances.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): I employ one member of staff in the House of Commons. Does my right hon. Friend accept that it is disturbing that we are being told how we should go about our business in serving our constituents? It is not up to the body that has made this recommendation, the House authorities, or anyone but ourselves to decide whether we best serve our constituents by having staff here or in the constituency. I happen to have a constituency office. The proposals are simply unacceptable, and it is just as well that the Leader of the House should know that.

Mr. Hain: As I said, that is precisely why the motion refers the matter to the Members Estimate Committee. I agree that it is for Members to decide how they allocate their different allowances and serve their constituencies. Equally, however, there are constraints. One of those is the amount of accommodation that is available on the parliamentary estate; another is that those of us with constituency offices incur considerable additional costs, which are not incurred by Members who have all their staff located here. We have all sorts of different interests to balance.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): The IEP should not be used to put pressure on staff salaries, which is why they have been kept separate; nor should it be used to pay for overnight stays for Members of Parliament on parliamentary business, which properly come under the additional costs allowance. When the Committee considers these issues, will the Leader of the House bear in mind that the rules for the additional cost allowance were drawn up in 1971 before there was a Parliament in Scotland, a National Assembly in Wales or any other assemblies that might come into being? Costs incurred on overnight stays on parliamentary business involving those places should come under the additional costs allowance.

Mr. Hain: I noted the hon. Gentleman's amendment, which was not selected. The difficulty is that the additional costs allowance is intended for a very specific purpose: to allow Members of Parliament to have both a constituency home and a London home in order that we can do our jobs effectively. If the ACA were to be redirected to other areas, that would raise issues about the basis on which it is established. The hon. Gentleman may claim under the incidental expenses provision.

The hon. Gentleman refers to the Scottish Parliament. That does not affect me, for example, because I have no constituency interest in going there, although I visit the Welsh Assembly, which, as it happens to be between my constituency and London, does not cause a problem. The hon. Gentleman can continue to press his case, and we will no doubt continue to take account of it.

If I may make a little progress, I shall deal with some of the points that hon. Members have made. Amendment (g), which was tabled by the hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page) and others, would increase the staffing allowance to £80,460—the amount that the SSRB recommended—for all Members, ending the system of differential allowances for London-based Members and those with their staff based in the constituency, while allowing Members to use up to 10 per cent. of the staffing allowance to fund their constituency office. Linked to that is amendment (h), which would remove from the motion the proposed reference of the SSRB's recommendation on the IEP to the Members Estimate Committee.

I sympathise with the underlying point of amendment (g), which suggests that although Members with staff in London pay out more in salaries for their staff, Members with staff in their constituency may pay out more on office rental and other costs. That needs to be recognised in the funds that are provided.

However, the amendment would not encourage any location of staff to constituency offices. Furthermore, the staffing allowance and incidental expenses provision are each available for specific purposes, as I explained, and there is a logic to ring-fencing them for those purposes. Allowing the staffing allowance to be put towards office costs would be a new departure and would undermine the principle that the staffing allowance should be ring-fenced and available only for the purpose of paying for work done.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): The Leader of the House has made much reference to ring-fencing to protect the salaries of staff. We are all sympathetic to that, but does he recognise that since the House introduced standard conditions of employment, with standard salary ranges, that argument has largely disappeared?

Mr. Hain: I am not entirely sure that it has disappeared. It concerns the principle mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick): that it is for each Member to determine, within the acceptable custom and practice that the SSRB and the House rules provide, how to pay staff, whether they are based in the constituency or in London.

Most significantly, amendment (g) would go well beyond the increase in staffing allowance recommended by the SSRB; I am advised that it would cost an extra £2 million to £3 million. I must therefore urge the House to reject it.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Leader of the House says that the proposal will cost an extra £2 million to £3 million. From the SSRB's report, how much will the increase in the incidental expenses provision cost?

Mr. Hain: I do not have the figures, but the House authorities advise me that it would be an additional cost on top of the proposal that the SSRB recommended. I obviously need to rely on that advice.

Mr. Heald: Does the Leader of the House accept that the figures are not based on any research? If one examines the proposal for more money for IEP, amendment (g), which proposes instead more flexibility in the staff budget, appears neutral. Has the right hon. Gentleman gleaned some behavioural effect or research from the House authorities that supports the estimate of £2 million?

Mr. Hain: We all rely on the Department of Finance and Administration, which has great expertise, and it has advised about the figures that I have presented to the House.

I understand the unrest and anxiety, which is why I did not put the straight SSRB recommendation in the form of a motion. Indeed, the SSRB said that its practical phasing and implementation might need further consideration. Had I tabled such a motion, it would have been defeated for all sorts of reasons, some of which have been raised with me. I have therefore given hon. Members an opportunity to reflect, through the Members Estimate Committee, on how we should move forward. I believe that a much better approach would be for that Committee, which you chair, Mr. Speaker, to consider the SSRB's proposal for abating the IEP to encourage the location of staff away from the parliamentary estate.

The Committee will consider the picture in the round, including the interaction between the staffing allowance and the IEP. That is a proper course of action, which will avoid hasty compromises with uncertain effects.

Miss Widdecombe: I am grateful to the Leader of the House for giving way to me a second time. If his recommendation is accepted and the matter is referred back to the Members Estimate Committee, would not it be appropriate for the House to express a view to that Committee about what it considers to be reasonable basic employment provision, which should not attract penalties? I am sad that my amendment (d) was not selected, but will the right hon. Gentleman at least undertake to ensure that the view of the House is taken before the Members Estimate Committee considers the matter?

Mr. Hain: The Members Estimate Committee reflects the wishes of the House and can receive representations through the Speaker's advisory panel and ordinary representations. The fact that everything is being conducted so openly allows hon. Members to make their points. I understand the point that the right hon. Lady made in amendment (d), which was backed by many hon. Members from all parties. It relates to my earlier point that I understand the accommodation pressures and the desire on the part of the House authorities for location away from the parliamentary estate to constituency offices. There is enormous pressure, especially through interns, on the parliamentary estate. However, we are parliamentarians—I believe that that lies behind the right hon. Lady's amendment—not glorified social workers. We are parliamentarians in addition to providing a first-class constituency advice and assistance service. I believe that most of us try to provide such a service. Although the numbers have to be determined and have to be proportionate to the availability of accommodation and resources, it is important to sustain the case for locating staff here.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I have been a Member of Parliament for 33 years and the SSRB report is the first example of a report that seeks to tell Members of Parliament how to organise their offices. That is extremely dangerous. An outside body, with little experience of our work, is advising us on how to do our job. I am grateful that the Leader of the House said that the matter will be referred to the Members Estimate Committee—I shall support that motion. I hope that the Committee will take into consideration the views of the House as expressed in the debate. Will the right hon. Gentleman express some anxiety about the fact that, for the first time, an outside body has sought to tell hon. Members how to organise their offices and the job that they do in the House and in their constituencies?

Mr. Hain: As I have signalled in the clearest possible terms, I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. However, I must disagree emphatically with any suggestion that the SSRB has operated in an improper fashion. The SSRB is not telling him, me or any other Member what to do. It has provided a set of incentives—whether the House and the Members Estimate Committee accept them or not—to fulfil a set of criteria that it was invited to investigate. They include pressure on the parliamentary estate and the anomaly that hon. Members with staff who are based only on the estate get the whole IEP and do not bear the costs of a constituency office, as, for example, I do. It proposed a recommendation in good faith. We should respect that and I do not accept that it was ordering any of us to do anything. In the end, the House will make the decision.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): If the SSRB had not made the recommendations, an entirely different set of people would be in the Chamber, complaining bitterly that it was not advantageous for them to have offices in their constituencies. Many hon. Members do not have staff in the House. The proposal is not as draconian as it appears at first sight. The SSRB also recommended that hon. Members should have computers as well as a laptop for themselves. [Interruption.] If the work station is based here and shared by a member of staff, I presume that it would not count against the £7,500 reduction in the IEP, which would allow hon. Members to have two members of staff here with only one work station. [Interruption.]

Mr. Hain: I stress to hon. Members that my hon. Friend has done a lot of work on our behalf and her point is about the number of work stations that one can have in order to be allocated the specific provisions under the IEP that the SSRB recommends. Hon. Members can vary the number of staff according to the availability of work stations. That sort of detail makes it important for the Members Estimate Committee to consider the matter in greater depth.

Mr. Dobson: For many years, Members of Parliament decided that we needed to improve the office accommodation for our staff and ourselves. Given that there is now more office accommodation than ever, why has someone decided on our behalf that we should discourage people from letting their staff use the accommodation? Three people work in my outer office. If I get rid of two, someone will continue to use the outer office and there will be no gain. My right hon. Friend says that we should submit the proposal to the Members Estimate Committee, but it will consider a transition towards something to which we have never agreed.

Mr. Hain: The recommendation has been made precisely because I was aware of the concerns that my right hon. Friend and others have expressed. The Members Estimate Committee will therefore have a chance to examine the proposal in more detail.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give way?

Mr. Hain: I am afraid that I need to make progress.

Mr. Field: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on the point that we are considering?

Mr. Hain: No. I need to answer my right hon. Friend's other points and then I shall give way.

The truth is that this place is bursting. There are already far too many people working here, and it is not the case that we could just fill up our offices with existing paid and unpaid members of staff. Even unpaid members of staff have an effect, through the greater use of catering and other facilities here, resulting in a drain on the House's resources. If we expect other people to be careful about public spending, we cannot simply expand our allowances and accommodation willy-nilly.

Sir Michael Spicer: The theme running through this debate is that Members feel that they are not being properly consulted, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) pointed out. Will the Leader of the House give us an assurance that, when the Members Estimate Committee has done its work, the House will have a chance to take a view on its recommendations?

Mr. Hain: On that specific point, I can say yes. If the Members Estimate Committee comes back with major changes to the way in which the allowance is structured—whether of the exact nature that the SSRB has recommended, or a variation or equivalent of it—of course the House will have to make a decision on them. That is absolutely right.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hain: I shall take one last intervention, then I must make some progress, because I know that other Members want to move their amendments and contribute to the debate.

Mr. Betts: My right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) talked about the office accommodation that has been provided here. Does the Leader of the House agree that it would be strange, having built Portcullis House a few years ago with specifically dedicated accommodation for staff to work alongside Members, if we were to pass a resolution now to discourage Members from employing any staff to work in that accommodation? There is something slightly not joined up about that thinking.

Mr. Hain: That is another reason why it is right for the House, through the Members Estimate Committee, to consider further these conflicting points.

Mr. Mark Field rose—

Mr. Hain: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment, because he has been trying to intervene on me. I did something very unusual in the case of this SSRB report, in that I did not just put down the recommendations from the board, because I knew that they would provoke precisely the concerns that have been raised here this afternoon.

Mr. Field: There is a universal dislike of the whole notion of abatement, the reasons for which a number of hon. Members have set out. For inner London Members and those who do not claim the additional costs allowance, who are assumed to have a single base, this whole idea is an absolute nightmare. I saw in this idiotic report—I am not a great fan of the SSRB report—the suggestion that we could somehow get office space at between £8 and £23 a square foot. I should be very interested to see whether the Serjeant at Arms Department could find me or the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) anything at that price in our constituencies. Is it seriously being suggested that those of us with constituencies in central London should open satellite offices in Luton, Slough or Reading in order to make ends meet? That really is absolute nonsense.

Mr. Hain: I am not suggesting that, and nothing that I have said suggests that. This is an independent report, and I hope that, on consideration, the hon. Gentleman will withdraw what he said about it being idiotic. It has been very carefully considered, although whether it has come to the right conclusion on this particular issue is a matter for the House. We asked the SSRB to look independently into the provision that we make for ourselves; otherwise we could just vote whatever we liked for ourselves, without any independent advice, and it is important that we bear this in mind.

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): This obscure debate is certainly one-sided. I would like to ask my right hon. Friend and other hon. Members whether they realise the impact of the lack of accommodation in the parliamentary estate. Some Members of Parliament are still working in offices that do not even have windows, never mind accommodation for staff.

Mr. Hain: That is part of the complexity that we are having to wrestle with. I would like to make some progress now, because I think that I can help the House in the debate that is to follow.

Even if the House were to accept amendment (g), I hope that it will reject amendment (h). I believe that it would still be helpful for the Members Estimate Committee to consider this matter thoroughly; the questions that have just been put to me underline that point.

On the question of information technology provision, paragraph 3 provides that, with effect from the beginning of the next Parliament, the level of provision of IT equipment and support be increased in line with recommendations 11 and 12 of the SSRB's report. In other words, the level of provision of IT equipment should be increased by one, so that each Member has one fixed workstation and one laptop for his or her own use, plus three further workstations, so that each full-time equivalent member of staff paid for through the staffing allowance has his or her own PC, and that each Member should also have two heavy-duty printers. The level and range of IT support offered to constituency offices should also be improved to a level comparable with that offered on the parliamentary estate.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I warmly welcome the two recommendations that the Leader of the House is describing. Does he accept, however, that if we are to have more remote facilities and more support from staff here and elsewhere, the network needs urgent attention to ensure that remote users of the parliamentary data and video network—the PDVN—have an adequate service?. It really is not adequate at the moment. The service in the House is not at all bad—I speak as someone with 30 years' experience in the world of information and communications technology—but the remote service is not adequate.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend has raised this matter before. It is precisely for those reasons that the SSRB has recommended extra provision for a local constituency IT service comparable with that offered on the parliamentary estate, provided at local level. The House and I fully accept this recommendation, and I know that the House authorities will resource it.

I believe that Members on both sides of the House will welcome these recommendations on IT, which reflect proposals by the Information Committee. It is important that Members, and Members' staff, should be adequately, although not lavishly, equipped to function effectively in the information age, and particularly to interact better with our constituents. The increased IT support for constituency offices should help those Members who choose to locate their staff away from the parliamentary estate.

Paragraph 4 relates to the London supplement. It would implement the SSRB's recommendation that the London supplement should be increased from next April to £2,500, the same level as the proposed enhancement to the staffing allowance in respect of London-based staff, and that this sum should be adjusted annually in line with the average earnings index. It would also implement the SSRB's recommendation that, in future, Ministers and officeholders should be able to claim the London supplement only if they did not claim the additional costs allowance.

Mr. Mark Field: Does the Leader of the House accept that the conclusion in paragraph 4.35 that there were

"no major concerns about the London Supplement" is odd, given that I have spoken and written to him and his predecessors about the very low level of the supplement? I was particularly disturbed to read that the report stated that

"we did not interview any MPs with inner London constituencies."

On what basis, therefore, can it possibly conclude that the recommendation that the allowance should go up to a paltry £2,500 is credible, given that central London Members have to have a main, rather than a second, London home, when Members who claim the additional costs allowance are claiming at the rate of £20,902 a year? The methodology behind the London supplement is entirely wrong. A figure seems to have been plucked from the sky, which is one of the reasons why I tabled an amendment to the motion, although it has unfortunately not been selected.

Mr. Hain: I know that the hon. Gentleman wanted to put an alternative point of view before the House. The SSRB did not just pluck the figure out of thin air, as he has implied. It is based on equivalent civil service rates. The additional costs allowance is to enable Members with constituencies outside the London area to provide a proper service and to live in their constituency, which is a central part of modern parliamentary life.

May I make a further point in relation to what the hon. Gentleman has just said? Eight individual MPs gave evidence to the SSRB, including the Opposition deputy Chief Whip, the chair of the Labour party, the Liberal shadow Leader of the House, and many other Members of Parliament—[Interruption.] The shadow Leader of the House did, too—we would not want to forget him. Of course, I gave evidence on behalf of the Government, so it is not the case that no evidence was given. More evidence could have been given, including from the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field), because everybody knew the inquiry was going on.

Paragraph (5) is to implement the SSRB's recommendations on the car mileage allowance. It provides that car mileage allowance should be payable at the same rates as the maximum car mileage rates which the Inland Revenue recognises as excluding a profit element. Car mileage will be payable at a rate of 40p per mile up to 10,000 miles and 25p per mile thereafter, instead of 57.7p per mile up to 20,000 miles and 26.6p per mile thereafter, as at present. Those rates will be adjusted automatically in line with the future changes in the Inland Revenue rates.

In part compensation for the reduction in the mileage allowance, and also for the loss of free parking at airports, paragraph (5) makes new provision for the cost of parking a car, motor cycle or bicycle to be reimbursed

"if wholly, exclusively and necessarily incurred in the performance of parliamentary duties".

The Members Estimate Committee and the advisory panel on Members' allowances will be asked to approve the rules for claims. I believe that this change will be widely welcomed.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Inland Revenue recommended rate for mileage allowance has not increased for several years? It has remained stationary.

Mr. Hain: Yes, I understand that that is the case.

I recognise that the proposed change represents a significant reduction in car mileage allowance and that this will have a significant impact on those Members who are heavily dependent on car transport, particularly those with large rural constituencies. I also recognise that the immediacy of the changes—by 1 April—could put some Members in real difficulties if they have entered into leasing or purchase agreements that go beyond that date.

The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) and others have quite properly tabled an amendment that would freeze the current rate until the Inland Revenue rates catch up with the House rates. That could be many years, however. The effect of the amendment is therefore firmly to reject the SSRB recommendation, which I have put before the House.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am putting this marker down now while a number of Members are present. The Inland Revenue rate seems to fail entirely to take into account, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, the size of a constituency and the need for a Member to use his car in that large area to undertake constituency duties. There is no difference between an inner-city seat and a large urban seat, which surely is grotesquely unfair. It could be a disincentive to Members properly and fully undertaking constituency duties and, in some cases, travelling to London when there is not adequate public transport to enable them to do so.

Mr. Hain: I know the points that the hon. Gentleman is making. I dare say his constituents and mine would want to make the same points if they travelled a lot on business, but may I make this point? Some Members feel that the Inland Revenue rates are too low to reflect the true costs of motoring. The Government do not accept that. The 40p rate, which was set in the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003, covers the full costs of using a car for business travel for a wide range of types and size of car, including cars that are safe and comfortable for long business journeys. It is advantageous to drivers of small, environmentally friendly cars. It has been set at a level that will not subsidise all the standing costs of owning a larger, more fuel-hungry car, so that it does not encourage drivers of larger cars to drive unnecessary business miles. It is, however, still generous enough fully to cover the marginal running costs of such cars.

In any case, if the House feels that the Inland Revenue rates are inadequate, that is an argument for reviewing those rates, not for diverging from them. I hope that the House will reject the amendment.

Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): The Leader of the House has just referred to what the Inland Revenue reckons that 40p covers, which is the marginal cost of using the vehicle, whereas our current motor mileage allowance purports to cover the capital cost of the vehicle as well, so we are considering two fundamentally different things. What is being proposed is a change of policy dressed up as a recalibration of some comparative figures. If we are to debate what is being proposed, we should do so with our eyes open, rather than confuse two completely different things.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point, but the SSRB has considered this in the round and considered what applies to our constituents, saying that we should be treated in the same way as they are. That is what it is arguing.

The hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), by contrast, has tabled an amendment that would strike out the proposal to allow hon. Members to claim for parking charges. While I sympathise with his wish to encourage the use of other forms of transport, the fact is that many hon. Members rely on cars in their constituencies and for at least part of their journey to and from this place. That point was made by the hon. Member for Macclesfield.

A problem has arisen in respect of the withdrawal of free car parking provision by BAA, as a result of shareholder action. That has placed a lot of Members of the House who rely on air transport in Scotland, north-west and north-east England and elsewhere in real difficulty, because if they have to leave their cars for the best part of a week a huge additional cost is incurred. I would point out that the provision that we recommend applies to motor cycles and bicycles as well as to cars.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I have looked through the SSRB report and I can find no recommendation relating to parking. Have I missed it or is it a subsequent invention as part of the motion?

Mr. Hain: I think the hon. Gentleman has missed it. If he looks more carefully, he will see it.

Mr. McLoughlin: On the parking issue, previously there was deemed to be an element of profit in the motor mileage allowance. That was one reason for deciding that no allowance should be made when congestion charging was introduced. If we accept this proposal for parking, should not we also accept it for congestion charging if the profit element has gone from the motor mileage allowance?

Mr. Hain: The Inland Revenue does not provide for congestion charging to be met in such a way. I should say to the hon. Member for Lewes that if the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Macclesfield is carried, I will recommend that we support it, because built into the costs of the mileage rate of the House of Commons is provision to meet such costs. For example, if I travel across the Severn bridge I pay a toll. I do not think that that should be provided for by the House authorities, because the mileage rate is fairly generous. The same applies to parking.

Sir John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) (Con): The Inland Revenue figure is for the calculation of tax liability; it is not said that a higher allowance should not be paid by an employer. Simply, if an allowance is given above that figure, it is taxable. That is already the case with Members' existing allowance—it is taxable above 40p. That is a matter for the Inland Revenue to decide, but the fact that this does not accurately reflect modern costs of running a motor car is well known throughout the nation. The AA says that, as do all the motor car magazines that publish the costs of running a motor car. The Inland Revenue point has nothing to do with the real cost of running a car, but it relates to a threshold for taxation.

Mr. Hain: There is a lot of substance to the hon. Gentleman's argument, but the public in our constituencies are treated by the Inland Revenue in a certain way. [HON. MEMBERS: "So are we!"] Well, we are not, because we get a higher rate than is generally given. Anyway, this is ultimately—[Interruption.] Look, I understand the concerns. For goodness' sake, I acknowledged the concerns earlier by saying that I understand the points that are being made, particularly the sharp change— [Interruption.] Hon. Members ask why I am proposing what I am proposing. It would be a serious departure if the Leader of the House did not put before the House recommendations from the SSRB.

It is for the House to decide what it wishes to decide—that is our sovereign right—but asking an independent body such as the SSRB to look at this dispassionately and then not putting its proposals before the House would be a serious breach with tradition and practice in respect of independent advice from such a body.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): The fact that there is a tension between the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Lewes and that tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield, which I have supported, shows that the review body's recommendation does not suit all hon. Members. Despite the fact that we could have been consulted on the matter, this recommendation has come to many of us as a complete surprise, out of the blue. It is grossly unfair to those of us with large rural constituencies some distance from London. I agree that the provision can be unfair to people who have to use airports, but surely the matter should be referred back to the Members Estimate Committee if the amendment is not carried.

Mr. Hain: I understand that point, but I have an obligation to put before the House recommendations from the SSRB. It would be a serious breach of practice adopted by previous Leaders of the House were that not done.

I will now take what must be the final intervention.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that when Members vote on the matter they should bear it in mind that it is difficult to explain to the public why we are prepared to accept SSRB recommendations when they increase our pay and allowances, but not so keen to accept them when they lead to a reduction? Without wishing to be pious, does he agree that at a time when every party talks about the need to combat climate change, we should at least set some example in relation to the mileage for which we claim and the vehicles that we operate?

Mr. Hain: Yes, I do. I speak as someone with a large constituency, with large rural areas, who must necessarily incur large constituency mileage in going about my parliamentary duties.

The proposed provision for the reimbursement of parking—for parliamentary duties only—will be fully justified if the House agrees to reduce the mileage allowance as the SSRB has recommended. If the House rejects amendment (c), I hope that it will also reject amendment (i). If the House agrees to amendment (c), however, I shall support amendment (i), and I hope that the House will also do so. That is because the existing car mileage rates include an element to cover parking charges. Amendment (c) on its own would allow double reimbursement for parking costs.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hain: I am sorry but I must stick to what I said earlier; otherwise, like a parent with a—I will not continue with that line of thought. [Laughter.]

Paragraph (6) deals with the incidental expenses provision. The SSRB's report recommends that the provision be increased to a maximum of £27,500, and that the amount that may be claimed by Members should be abated by £7,500 for each permanent workstation occupied by their staff on the parliamentary estate. As the SSRB acknowledges, this recommendation could involve a significant reorganisation of current office arrangements for many Members, or else a significant loss of income. The SSRB states that it would understand were the House to conclude that the recommendation should apply only to new Members and that certain transitional arrangements should operate for currently serving Members. The Government believe that it would be appropriate for the Members Estimate Committee to give further consideration to this matter, particularly in the light of the points raised during this debate and the strong views expressed.

I fully support the principle behind the SSRB's recommendation—we must take steps to relieve pressure on the parliamentary estate, and we must address the current disincentives discouraging Members from basing their staff in constituency offices—but there are a number of other factors to take into account, which the SSRB was not able to address: security, for example, and the administration of House services. The Members Estimate Committee will be able to consider the various factors in the round.

On parliamentary pensions, the SSRB has made two recommendations. I am grateful to the trustees and their chairman for their work on this matter. Before I examine the matter, I want to say on behalf of the House how indebted we are to those Members who serve as our trustees. They have important and wide-ranging duties and responsibilities, and I would like to record my particular thanks to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill) and his fellow trustees for their continued excellent service in running our pension scheme.

The second motion before the House is to implement the SSRB recommendation that the contribution rate for those scheme members who have opted for their pension to build up at a rate of one fortieth of final salary for each year of service should increase from 9 per cent. to 10 per cent. It may be recalled that in 2002, the SSRB recommended that, in the first instance, the contribution rate of members who opted for the one-fortieth accrual rate should increase to 9 per cent. It recommended that the remaining cost of the benefit improvement should be taken into account in subsequent reviews of pay and allowances. That would mean that eventually the full cost of implementation would be borne by Members on an ongoing basis. The Government accepted that recommendation.

[Mr. Hain]

The SSRB has now considered the options for recovering the remaining cost. It has concluded that it would be unfair to restrict future pay increases for all Members irrespective of whether they had opted for the one-fortieth accrual rate. It has instead recommended that the contribution rate for those who opted for the improved accrual rate should increase by 1 per cent. from 1 April 2004. It considers that an appropriate step towards recovering the full cost. The SSRB remains of the view that the full cost of the benefit improvement should in due course be borne by Members on an ongoing basis. It intends to take the outstanding amount into account in its next review of parliamentary pay and allowances.

The Government are content with the SSRB's recommendation to phase the recovery of the additional cost and believe that it should be implemented. If the House agrees, I understand that the trustees would propose that the collection of arrears back to 1 April this year should be spread over the balance of the current tax year, so that Members are not saddled suddenly with a huge bill. The Government are happy with that approach.

The SSRB has recommended that the trustees should decide what action to take on the recommendations outstanding from its 2001 report. The main outstanding recommendations relate to the extension of survivor benefits to unmarried partners and the introduction of pensions for life for surviving widows and widowers. The Government's policy is that such benefit improvements could be introduced only if Members are prepared to meet the additional costs. That is consistent with our line on other public service schemes. In 2001, the House expressed its view rightly that survivor benefits should apply to unmarried partners as well as spouses. I have therefore been in discussion with the trustees about how those important provisions can be introduced in a way that is fair to Members and to the taxpayer. The issue of civil partners is slightly different. It is expected that the scheme will be amended to provide benefits for surviving civil partners, and that any additional costs arising from that will be met by the Exchequer.

The Government have noted the observation made by the SSRB in its report that phasing out the favourable early retirement terms in the scheme would be consistent with the Government's policy on public service pension age and might make possible benefit improvements as part of a package. The Government therefore feel that this represents a sensible way forward. The additional cost of providing pensions to partners and not just spouses can therefore be offset and remain cost-neutral by implementing the new retirement provisions.

Mr. Davidson: Given that the Leader of the House and several of his Government colleagues have said on a number of occasions that they wish that a variety of hon. Members would go away, is not this change inconsistent, as it makes it less likely that they will do so?

Mr. Hain: I do not remember any such recommendation from me unless it was in respect of Conservative Members of Parliament. It would be good to see more Labour Members of Parliament in the House. [Laughter.] I am not going down that road, either.

The Government's policy on pension age, first announced in the 2002 pensions Green Paper, is that the rules of public service schemes should be changed to make an unreduced pension payable from age 65 rather than 60.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): A uniquely separate set of circumstances applies to Members of Parliament compared with other public sector workers: the trigger dates for our choices are not in our hands but in the hands of the Prime Minister. I note that the motion says that the scheme will be "phased out for existing members from 1st April 2009".

I see nothing in the Command Paper that defines the methodology in that regard. Will that be subject to a separate resolution, and will there be consultation with the trustees?

Mr. Hain: There will certainly be consultation with the trustees. I have already discussed the matter with their chairman. There will not be a separate motion; this motion will decide the matter.

All Members are to be allowed to draw pension before the age of 65 on an actuarially neutral basis, not just those with at least 15 years' service. Those who have at least 15 years' service on 31 March 2009 will continue to be eligible for early retirement terms which are more favourable than actuarially neutral. Those who serve beyond 1 April 2009 will not have access to an unreduced pension before the pension age of 65.

Mr. Miller: So it will not be phased out, as the motion says; it will be ended. Perhaps the motion should be amended accordingly.

Mr. Hain: The end date is 2009 or the general election after next, whichever is the later.

Mr. Miller: That is not phasing.

Mr. Hain: It is. I am sure my hon. Friend will understand this. Each individual Member is in a different position owing to differences in age and length of service, so this provision affects them in different ways. I could give various examples, including that of my own position, if that is of any interest.

Mike Gapes: Is there not an important difference between introducing changes that affect new Members and introducing changes that affect many Members, including me, in a way that does not involve a right to vote on it as a separate item, and puts us in an invidious position? We will have to vote something down in order to defend our own position, because we can see the difficulties that it will cause us by forcing us either to go very early or to stay until we are about 67. This has not been thought through clearly. Can my right hon. Friend please look at it again?

Mr. Hain: I am sorry to have to tell my hon. Friend, with whom I have a long-standing friendship, that he should study the detail. His position will not be prejudiced, except in one respect.

We are seeking to bring the House of Commons in line with civil servants and other public sector workers, including my hon. Friend's constituents. We are here by permission of the electorate. There is a real problem if we are saying that because of the ageing society and the cost of providing pensions at the taxpayer's expense—which applies in our case as well—we should have fantastically more advantageous pension conditions than our constituents who work in the public sector. We are trying to bring the Government's changes in line with demographic factors affecting the country.

Sir John Butterfill: May I explain why "phasing out" is, in my view, an appropriate term? The changes will come into force gradually. As from this November, new Members will no longer be entitled to the early retirement provision. Existing Members will continue to be entitled to the provision until 2009 and possibly beyond, depending on the date of the general election. Some Members who are re-elected after the next general election will continue to be entitled to the existing arrangements, even possibly until the following general election, so it is a phasing process. The motion will enable the trustees to change the rules of the scheme to allow all this to be put in place.

Mr. Hain: The lucidity of the hon. Gentleman's intervention explains why he is chairman of the trustees and, perhaps, why I am not.

The point is—I think the whole House will understand this, and back it—that the Government are phasing out generous early retirement provisions in the public sector. It would be inconsistent, and would not be understood by our constituents, if we exempted ourselves from these provisions. We must be careful not to cause our own voters to think we are putting ourselves in an extremely privileged position.

The pension age in the parliamentary scheme is already 65, but Members with at least 15 years' service can retire early before that age on favourable terms. Those terms include the ability, often referred to as the "rule of 80", to draw unreduced benefits if they retire early—between the ages of 60 and 65—provided that age plus service totals at least 80.

The third motion proposes a package addressing the issues relating to survivor benefits and early retirement. It would be at least cost-neutral to the Exchequer, which is an important requirement. It proposes the introduction of pensions for surviving unmarried partners of existing active Members, calculated on the same basis as pensions for widows and widowers. I am sure that that will be widely welcomed, as it is in line with the decision already made by the House in principle.

The trustees and the Government Actuary would be involved in working out the detailed implementation of the package, as was mentioned by the chairman of the trustees. In the case of survivor pensions that would include, for example, consideration of what constitutes an eligible partner, and measures to ensure that the provisions remain affordable.

The motion proposes that pensions for widows, widowers and surviving partners of existing active Members should be payable for life, and not cease on remarriage or cohabitation as widow and widower pensions do at present. That is an anomaly, which we are correcting. It also proposes that the favourable early retirement terms should be removed for new Members immediately, and phased out—I insist that that is the correct term—for existing Members from 1 April 2009 or the day after the general election after next, whichever is the later.

That means that anyone retiring at the next general election will not be affected. Nor will anyone retiring at the general election after that. Indeed, by 2009 nearly half of us—48 per cent—will be able to retire immediately and draw our pensions without any reduction. We will either be over 65 or will have served for more than 20 years, and will qualify for unreduced benefits under the rule of 80. A further 17 per cent of us—including me, as it happens—will either be able to retire then and draw our pensions on better than actuarially neutral terms, or have the potential to do so when we are older.

Mr. Betts: First, will my right hon. Friend spell out more clearly the nature of the residual benefit that will remain after 2009? I do not entirely understand—perhaps other Members do not either—what will happen to those who retain some potential benefit under the existing scheme. Will it go completely after 2009, or will it continue in some form?

Secondly, does my right hon. Friend accept what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller)? There is a difference between Members of Parliament and those in other schemes. We cannot go on our 65th birthdays; we have to go on the date of the general election. If people cannot go with reduced pensions before they are 65, my right hon. Friend is effectively saying that the average retirement age of MPs is 67 or 68.

Mr. Hain: These are complex matters. We already have generous pensions by most people's standards: the whole House will agree with that. It would be very dangerous if we did not put ourselves in line with the retirement provisions that now apply to other public sector workers, let alone those with much less favourable terms.

Let me give some examples of how the arrangements would work. On 31 March 2009, a Member aged 54 who has served for 13.6 years will have given over 15 years' service but will not meet the rule of 80. That Member will be able to draw pension before 65 on favourable terms, but not on an unreduced basis. Let us consider the position of a 1987 entrant who, as of 3 November 2004—today—is aged 55 and has 17.4 years' service. As of March 2009, they will meet the rule of 80 and will be able to draw pension immediately on an unreduced basis, so the scheme will continue. As of March 2009, an older, 1992 entrant—aged 59, for example—with 12.6 years' service will meet the rule of 80 and will be able to draw pension immediately on an unreduced basis. As of March 2009, a younger 1992 entrant, aged 43, with 12.5 years' service, will have more than 15 years' service but will not meet the rule of 80. They will, however, be able to draw pension before 65 on favourable terms, but not on an unreduced basis. So it is not the case that Members will suddenly fall over the edge and get no benefit at all; rather, it is a question of providing for these changes in a proper fashion.

[Mr. Hain]

Finally, I note the SSRB's observation that it will be for the Government, in conjunction with the trustees, to consider the implications of the new pension tax regime. The Finance Act 2004 sets out a much-simplified tax treatment of pensions, and I can confirm that that will apply to the parliamentary pension scheme. The Government look forward to working with the trustees on its detailed implementation. I urge the House to vote for these motions, especially those relating to pensions. It is very important that we bring our own practice in line with outside practice, and that we preserve our own conditions in the way that I described. I reiterate the Government's thanks to the SSRB for conducting this triennial review. A respected independent body has recommended certain changes to our allowances and pension arrangements, and I hope that the House will agree to their implementation in the way that I described.

2.1 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): The Senior Salaries Review Body's triennial review is an important piece of work, and I, too, would like to thank John Baker, the chairman of the SSRB, and its other members, who have clearly worked hard to produce that report. The SSRB has done its work conscientiously for many years, and it is vital that information such as this be placed in the public arena.

In all parts of the House and in the country, it is recognised that Members need services such as staff, postage, transport, and personal and office accommodation, in order to do the job effectively on behalf of their constituents, many of whom come to them for help when they have been turned away elsewhere, or when they have been unsuccessful in their struggle against a particular bureaucracy. We speak often about connecting Parliament with the public, and it is imperative that parliamentarians maintain, and be seen to maintain, the highest standards of probity and adherence to the principles of public life. But it also should not be forgotten that we do a vital job, and that when our constituents most need help, they come to us.

The work and independence of the SSRB has been important in providing the public with an element of reassurance about our accountability. Members of Parliament were first paid in 1911, and our pay levels have always been controversial, primarily because we are one of the few groups with the power to set our own salaries. The mechanism for mitigating this is, and has been since 1970, the objective assessment of a body that is independent and outside Parliament: the SSRB.

Since that time, the SSRB's terms of reference have been revised on several occasions. The development of its role is welcome, but I still feel that there is scope for making the setting of parliamentary salaries more independent, and in particular for finding firm employment comparators for Members—and sticking to them.

On allowances, I welcome the fact that more of the services necessary to Members are being provided centrally by the House authorities. That has already happened with computers, and such an approach is being tested with the travelcard. The move towards pay scales for staff is a further important step in the right direction. However, I have a concern that seems to be shared in all parts of the House, and I wonder whether you also share it, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The SSRB compares us to chief executives of councils and businesses. Such people employ private secretaries, and their costs are treated as something that a council or company would necessarily provide. Nobody ever talks about them receiving "expenses" or allowances in that regard; such things are treated as the tools of the job, not a perk. So I hope that on another day, we can discuss how these matters might be better presented in future.

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): The hon. Gentleman is making a very powerful point, and it might help his case if I remind him that the comparators that the SSRB uses for Members are in fact head teachers of middle-ranking secondary schools and police superintendents. I perhaps wish that it did use the comparator of chief executives of local authorities.

Mr. Heald: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. If he looks a little further into the report, he will see that the managing director of a business is treated as one of our comparators in the private sector, as is a particular local authority grade.

Mr. McLoughlin: My hon. Friend mentioned earlier the supplying of computers. The current situation is wholly inadequate, so will he draw attention to recommendation 12 in the report? It states:

> "We recommend that the level and range of IT support offered to constituency offices should be improved to a level compatible with that offered on the Parliamentary Estate."

If Members are to find any way of locating in their constituencies, acting on that recommendation is one of the most important things to do. At the moment, there is a very long way to go, so will he emphasise that that recommendation needs to be implemented?

Mr. Heald: My hon. Friend makes the point about IT very well. He and I both gave evidence to the review, which focused on the position of Members with outside offices and the need for more help. When we considered the incidental expenses provision, we were looking for an element of help for those with offices outside Westminster, and the complexities and difficulties associated with the SSRB's recommendations are something that we will have to contend with.

On this year's recommendations, I want to thank the Leader of the House for discussing with me the form of his main motion. Of course, these are free-vote matters, but I feel able to offer him a strong measure of support. The pensions changes reflect the SSRB's views and the increased cost of providing parliamentary pensions, and they ensure that the main burden is not placed on the taxpayer. That seems non-controversial, and I want to pay tribute to the trustees of the parliamentary scheme, and particularly to its chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill). They have taken the trouble to do so much in terms of training and talking to Members about these issues; indeed, he offered an admirable explanation of the various changes a few minutes ago. The examples that the Leader of the House gave show that such changes are being phased in, and they certainly reflect what is happening in the civil service. I also accept that the salary rate should not increase above inflation.

I accept the motion on Members' allowances, which reflects the SSRB's thinking. However, the recommendations on incidental expenses provision seem over-complex, creating as they do four levels of payment and a six-and-a-half-year transitional period. I am sure that further reflection would be worth while.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) that the report seems to contain a large number of references to Officers of the House giving evidence and guidance to the SSRB. It is important that we recognise that, much as we admire their work, they have never run a constituency or party office. Their guidance should be taken into account, but it should not be regarded as the final word on the subject. The principle that those who have an office outside Westminster incur extra costs in providing the services available to Members here seems correct, but establishing non-eligibility to the new payment by reference to how many workstations a Member has seems problematic. A simpler system that retains equality of treatment of Members, but which allows a Member to use part of his salaries budget towards office costs outside London, might well be the way forward. That would also avoid an increase in the incidental expenses provision, while giving an extra element of flexibility within the same envelope. The costs involved should be relatively neutral.

Although there has been some talk of a cost to the House authorities if the change goes through, I do not believe that it is based on any research—I understand that it is not—and it seems to me that unless it has some behavioural effect that has not been described, it should be a relatively neutral proposal. I would like to hear what hon. Members have to say, but I am inclined to support the proposal.

The Leader of the House was right to say that amendment (h) may, on reflection, be unnecessary and it may be worth my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page) thinking more about whether it is necessary. It may be right for the Members Estimate Committee to look further into it.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Does my hon. Friend not accept that the ability of a Member of Parliament to employ two people within the Palace of Westminster should be entirely acceptable? I have one and a half members of staff here and have done for many years; the half member of staff is shared with my wife. We have one suite of offices and two members of staff in the office between our two individual offices. There should be no disincentive to having—quite legitimately—one secretary and one assistant or researcher. Surely there should be no disincentive to having that level of staffing for a Member of Parliament?

Mr. Heald: I agree with my hon. Friend and I also feel that it is right for an MP to be able to decide how to run his office within a reasonable band of options.

Mr. Mark Field: Given that my hon. Friend is on the Members Estimate Committee, will he pay some attention to the points that I made earlier to the Leader of the House about the particular strains that inner London Members would face if there were to be an abatement of provision? Will he do his best to ensure that inner London Members and those who do not claim the additional costs allowance and are assumed to have single base will be exempt from any abatement provision?

Mr. Heald: That point is probably best considered in the context of a more detailed report that my hon. Friend could present not only to me as shadow Leader of the House but to the Speaker's Panel, which plays an important role in advising on matters connected with pay and allowances. That would be the best way forward for my hon. Friend and his important points.

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend will be aware that my amendment (d) has not been selected, despite gaining 51 Members in support within a couple of hours of being tabled. I am sad about that. My amendment simply said that in referring the matter back to the Members Estimate Committee, we should express the opinion as a House that it is reasonable to employ two members of staff at Westminster. My hon. Friend has just said that he agrees with that, so does he also agree not only that it is reasonable, but that it is the House's view that the Members Estimate Committee should take it into account?

Mr. Heald: Yes, as I said, but I also believe in a neater approach rather than having so many different rates of IEP, which is the product of the system of abatements. I think that a proposal such as amendment (g) offers a simpler way of proceeding. My preference is to leave the decision with MPs and to have as simple a system as we can. I certainly believe that having four different rates of IEP and a transitional arrangement that creates another four rates of IEP for the next Parliament is not a satisfactory way forward. Having said that, the simple point that the SSRB was trying to reflect in its suggestions—that there should be some extra help for people who have offices outside London—is a good one. Indeed I, my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) and the Leader of the House himself made that point in evidence to the SSRB. In translating SSRB support for the concept into a practical solution, there might have been room for a simpler proposal.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con) rose—

Mrs. Anne Campbell rose—

Mr. Heald: Gosh, an "embarras de richesses". I shall give way to my hon. Friend first.

Mr. Sayeed: At some stage during his speech, will my hon. Friend explain to the House why, when we have built a very large and very expensive new office building, we are running out of space and need these proposals? Can he offer the House any figures about how many staff, Officers of the House and so forth are on the parliamentary estate and do not necessarily need to be based here?

Mr. Heald: As far as Members are concerned, I think I am right in saying that there about 2,500 passes issued for them and their teams. The report refers to about 900, who I assume are paid staff, so there is quite a difference between the number of paid staff on the estate and the number of pass holders. As regards the establishment of the House authorities, I do not have the figures to hand, but we should pay tribute to the staff of the House for the work that they do to support us. Personally, I would not want to criticise them in any way, which I hope meets the point.

Mrs. Campbell: I would like to refer to the hon. Gentleman's implied support for amendment (g). He will recall that, a few years ago, staff salary allowances and incidental expenses were not separate. We had an office cost allowance out of which everything was paid. There were reasons for changing from that system to a separate system of staff salaries. It was thought that many members of staff were not being properly paid and did not have proper terms and conditions. I believe that the changes introduced—the Members advisory panel was instrumental in making the recommendations—have had a major beneficial effect on staff pay and conditions in the House. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that amendment (g) takes us back to where we were before those changes were made?

Mr. Heald: I hope to persuade the hon. Lady. I agree totally that we should have an IEP that provides for the physical costs of an office outside the House and certain other expenses, and that the salaries budget should be separate from it. She will recall that it is possible to use part of the IEP to subsidise staff salaries. That might apply to Members who have an operation in London where staff costs are more expensive.

I believe that amendment (g) provides similar flexibility, applying to Members who might have lower staff costs outside London—the salary scales reflect that—but want to use part of it to subsidise the higher costs of providing an office outside London. It provides an element of equality between the two allowances and means that Members can have the same allowances, which is very important in the context of publishing the allowances. We should not have different rates of allowances if the public are going to see them published: they must be on an even basis. I hope that the hon. Lady will accept that making the change will not weaken the principle at all.

Sir Michael Spicer: Further to what my hon. Friend is saying, is it not also the case that up to 25 per cent. of the staff budget can already be used for consultancy purposes and for buying services? The flexibility already exists.

Mr. Heald: Yes, that is a strong point that supports my position.

On amendment (c), which deals with car mileage allowance, it is hard to avoid the logic of the SSRB recommendation that we should receive equality with our constituents. Although I accept the SSRB proposals, I look forward to hearing the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) and others and to seeing how they advance their case. Different circumstances may apply in different constituencies and in different parts of the UK. I will listen carefully to what my hon. Friend has to say, as I always do, and see how much support his arguments gain in the House today.

A crucial element of greater openness has been the detail provided about how Members' allowances are spent and the new publication of those details, which was handled very efficiently by the staff of the House. The old system lacked the necessary transparency and did not provide full information to the public. The publication of allowances has shown that MPs are generally providing a good service and that they need help to do so. I am sure that both sides of the House will join me in that view. Subject to the qualifying points that I have made, I shall support the motions before us today. We should back the recommendations of the review body.

I would have supported the amendment on pooled research facilities, and I hope that it is possible for that issue to be dealt with in some way in the future. It seems wrong that a shared researcher should be treated differently from a person who works directly to an hon. Member. I hope that some consideration can be given to that.

Of course, I shall monitor the strength of support for the various amendments to see whether a compelling case can be made for changes to the Government's plans. I am sure that we will have an interesting and reasoned debate, and I have kept my remarks reasonably brief as I know that many hon. Members want to contribute.

2.20 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury) (Lab): I want to concentrate on the SSRB's recommendation on incidental expenses, and especially on the question of abatement for those who have staff here in the House. I have no personal interest in this matter: I am standing down at the next election, so I will not benefit from or be disadvantaged by the proposals. However, I have a very strong interest in ensuring that my successor—whoever he or she is—and those of my colleagues who also represent London seats will not be severely disadvantaged by those proposals.

I shall make five very brief points. First, the proposals in the SSRB report will severely affect those hon. Members with existing staff who have always been based in the parliamentary estate. That is despite, but in some ways because of, the recommendation for a transitional period. The staff to whom I refer have been employed on the basis that this is their place of work. If, even after a period of one Parliament, this place ceases to be their place of work, the SSRB recommendation would amount to a serious change in their terms and conditions of work and could well mean that they have to terminate their employment.

Although having a transitional period is better than imposing such a change immediately, I am not sure that it is sensible for us to create what, in effect, is two tiers of membership of this House. Under the recommendations, some hon. Members would be able to have more staff here, and some would not. That does not strike me as terribly sensible.

Secondly, the provisions in the SSRB report will be very difficult for those hon. Members who represent constituencies in London, but especially so for those with inner-London constituencies. As the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) noted, establishing a constituency office in the City, Islington or Holborn costs much more than it does in many other parts of the country outside London. To assume that the same constituency office allowance will apply both in London and outside it takes no account of the differences in costs, prices, rent and so forth.

Many hon. Members with inner-London constituencies face an especially heavy constituency case load. I have been in this House for twenty-one and a half years. In all that time I have not used any of the allowances available to me to employ any researchers because I have had to devote all my resources to employing people to work on my constituency case load. At present, the number of cases in connection with immigration and asylum is very large for hon. Members with inner-city constituencies—and especially so for those in inner London—but the allowance system does not recognise the additional costs that those hon. Members incur.

Nothing in either the present or the proposed systems recognises the particular difficulties that face London Members. That is why I have always had my staff here in the parliamentary estate, and why I want to ensure that my successor has the same option, if he or she decides that that is in the best interests of constituents.

Thirdly, the SSRB proposal hits permanent staff but not people such as interns or volunteers, who share workstations and do not have their own. If my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and the review body are worried about pressure on the parliamentary estate because of the number of people using the facilities here, I would gently suggest that the report is aiming at the wrong target. The report hits permanent staff as I have described, but ignores the pressure that arises from non-permanent staff. That seems a rather partial approach to the problem.

Ian Stewart (Eccles) (Lab): My right hon. Friend mentioned the use of interns and volunteers, but does he accept that the use of such people has implications for the resources of the House? They all need to be trained to use the PDVN system, and they have other training needs that take up the House's resources.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is right, but I hasten to make it clear that I am not suggesting that it should not be possible to employ interns or volunteers. However, if we are taking a serious look at the pressure on the House's resources, we must accept that the problem is very complex. To assume that the SSRB recommendation is the only answer would be to ignore that complexity.

My fourth point is simple and blunt. Although it does not apply to me, I suspect that it will apply to some of my colleagues, especially those representing seats in London. If implemented, the proposals will involve redundancies among existing staff. That is not something that should be considered lightly, and I am not sure that the SSRB has taken account of the costs involved.

Miss Widdecombe: The right hon. Gentleman is taking us through this minefield in an exemplary fashion, but does he agree that the recommendation means that some of the most experienced members of staff would lose their jobs? They are the ones who have permanent workstations, and they have been kept here because of their knowledge.

Mr. Smith: The right hon. Lady is right. I confess that I can imagine saying that only in very rare circumstances, but she is absolutely correct on this point.

Norman Baker: And on hunting.

Mr. Smith: And on hunting, as the hon. Gentleman says.

My fifth point is perhaps the most important. In seeking to remove one perceived discrimination between hon. Members, the SSRB is in danger of inserting another. Its report seeks to help those hon. Members with constituency offices outside the parliamentary estate, but in doing so it would cause serious harm and difficulty to those hon. Members—and especially to those London Members—with offices and staff on the parliamentary estate. I suggest that, instead of removing one discrimination and creating another, the solution is to help the one category of hon. Member without harming the other.

That is why I shall support amendment (g). I believe that it offers an effective way of ensuring that we provide further support and assistance to those hon. Members with constituency-based offices so that they can run them properly and effectively.

The amendment makes sense, however, only if the incidental expenses provisions are left as they are—not enhanced and not abated. If the amendment is passed, I hope that will be the spirit in which the matter is approached. If it goes to the Members Estimate Committee, I hope that the Committee will take into account the concerns that I and many Members on both sides of the House have expressed.

Mr. Hain: With the shadow Leader of the House and some other Members, I am a member of the Committee, so perhaps I can offer my right hon. Friend some comfort by assuring him that we will certainly take close heed of the points that he and other Members have forcefully made.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for saying that. I would have expected no less from such an exemplary Leader of the House, but I hope that these serious issues will be considered carefully and that the rather simplistic approach that the review body proposes—albeit to achieve a sensible and fair purpose—will not be seen as the right way forward.

Mr. Heald: The Members Estimate Committee will take very seriously the points that the right hon. Gentleman is making and will ensure that they are adequately reflected in our discussions.

May I also say that I did not know that the right hon. Gentleman was retiring? We shall all miss him.

Mr. Smith: That event will occur only when the Prime Minister decides that the time is right for an election, but I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Mark Field: I am aware that many Members want to speak, so rather than make a speech myself I endorse all that the right hon. Gentleman said about the concerns of London Members. All too often, Members with country seats, perhaps especially in my party, do not understand the burdens to which he referred. In my constituency, which is very like his, there are not only 70,000 electors but 40,000 non-UK nationals. I have 600 live asylum and immigration cases, which puts an intolerable burden not so much on me but on the large number of staff I am required to employ. I endorse the right hon. Gentleman's remarks, as well as those of the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes), who spoke forcefully on the matter earlier.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman is right. The issues are common to all of us who represent London seats. The pressure is great and it has increased during the whole 21-year period I have been a Member.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend may be choosing to leave the House at the next election but no one could ever describe him as retiring.

On this occasion, my right hon. Friend speaks, as ever, for London, but is he as bemused as I am at a circumstance in which a review body on senior salaries appears to be concerning itself with staff deployment? If there is a problem with staff in the House, should not that be considered in isolation, rather than being spatchcocked into the SSRB report, which will have the most disastrous consequences for people such as my right hon. Friend and me who do not have a constituency office but try to give constituents the best possible service from an office in the Palace?

Mr. Smith: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. I am sorry that amendment (d) was not selected, as that would have enabled the House as a whole to give a clear indication of what we regard as a reasonable level for staff based in Westminster. That would not have taken account of the particular problems for London Members, but it would have enabled us to give a general view. As I am sure my hon. Friend will agree, Members, rather than the SSRB, must ultimately decide these matters.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, the shadow Leader of the House and the Members Estimate Committee will take those points on board if and when they consider these matters. They are serious matters; they affect the standard and quality of the service that we give our constituents.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I seek your help? The debate has just over an hour to run, but Members whose amendments were selected have not yet made a contribution. Will you make a plea to Members to be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker? Otherwise, there will be no formal presentation of the amendments that Mr. Speaker selected?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I am not sure that it is exactly correct to say that hon. Members who tabled amendments have so far made no contribution to the debate—that is perhaps why the opening speech from the Leader of the House was so long. However, the hon. Gentleman correctly observes that there is a limited amount of time available, so the Chair will do its best to accommodate as many Members as possible—but their comments must be brief.

2.35 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I am delighted to follow the right hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). I listened to him with great care and agree with every word he said. I am not a member of the Members Estimate Committee but I hope that it has taken seriously the issues he raised. I have a particular point of agreement with him, as I, too, can declare a non-interest in most of the matters before us, because I am due to retire at the next general election, which looks as though it will be sooner rather than later.

I want to refer to the principles behind the SSRB report. I accept that it is vital to preserve the principle that our package of remuneration and reimbursement of costs is assessed by an external, independent, authoritative body, just as monitoring and authenticating it is in the hands of rigorous auditing arrangements in the House. However, an equally important principle is that the body must have access to the fullest possible information about the work of parliamentarians. It has become increasingly apparent this afternoon that the SSRB has not been operating on the basis of intelligent analysis of the real work of parliamentarians. Indeed, it has, to a considerable extent, misunderstood the work we do in this place.

The emphasis of the report, especially the elaborate and convoluted section on office costs and the salaries of our staff, seems to suggest that MPs must be encouraged to concentrate our work in our constituencies. We are already under attack for neglecting our core role as parliamentarians—as scrutineers of the Government's legislative programme and of Executive action. If anything were to encourage the media and the public to think of us as overpaid and under-trained social workers, it would be the recommendations of the report, which would push things in that direction. That is a basic misunderstanding of our role in this place.

Within obvious limits, I insist that every Member of the House has the right and responsibility to serve the country and their constituents in whatever way he or she thinks most effective and appropriate. That is critical to the way in which Parliament operates. I fear, as is already apparent from the comments of several Members, that the SSRB does not understand that that is our role.

Nick Harvey: The Leader of the House fairly made the point that Members had the opportunity to give evidence to the SSRB, but, if we were broadly content with things as they were, there was no incentive to do so; only now that we have seen what the SSRB proposes is there any reason for us to comment. Bodies such as the boundary commissions consult after they make their initial proposals. There is more concern about the current SSRB report than ever before, so we must consider the future and ensure that there is a second round of consultation on its proposals before they are signed off; otherwise, we shall be put in the embarrassing position of having to repudiate the recommendations, which we do not want to do.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point, to which I want to return. As someone who gave evidence to the SSRB, I can speak with authority; there was no evidence from any Member of the House on the vital issue of our role. Nor, as far as I can establish, was there any evidence on mileage. As far as I am aware, no Member of the House gave evidence on those issues.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): I commend the hon. Gentleman's remarks, but I wish to point out that it is extraordinarily difficult to acquire knowledge about the role of an MP. All our constituencies have hugely different problems and we use our personality and judgment to interact with our constituencies in very different ways. The current rules give us a lot of scope to exercise our judgment, but this report gives us—in my view and, I hope, that of the hon. Gentleman—far less scope to take decisions that will benefit our constituents.

Mr. Tyler: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely important point. The diversity in the way in which we operate is the result of our very diverse constituencies.

Ian Stewart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: No, because I want to make progress. I know that other Members wish to contribute to the debate.

I wish to refer to a point that the right hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury made. It is not an answer to deal with one distortion by introducing another. Two wrongs do not make a right. However, I am afraid that is the whole basis on which the SSRB has approached the issue of staffing.

We should all examine carefully the way in which the SSRB has considered staffing allowances. The report refers to > "modern, high quality, fully serviced accommodation for MPs and their staff . . . available free of charge on the Parliamentary Estate in Westminster, particularly in Portcullis House".

The SSRB then makes a leap to a value judgment. It adds:

> "The present system as a whole acts as an incentive to locate staff on the Parliamentary Estate."

That is why we built Portcullis House.

When I first entered the House in 1974 for a very brief interlude, I had the end of a table and no phone. I had to meet my secretary somewhere down in the bowels of the earth. Therefore, to give us a proper opportunity to do our job, we in the House decided—I think with the nation's support—to improve the conditions in which our staff, and perhaps Members, operate. To refer to that as though it is a retrograde step is extraordinary and seems to go right beyond the way in which the SSRB should look at the issue. It may be that the SSRB's extended its remit itself.

Mr. Dobson: The SSRB's report goes on to say:

> "However none of the MPS who we met said they had actually chosen to establish office facilities or employ staff on the Parliamentary Estate for financial reasons."

It reached conclusions that are plainly contradictory to the evidence that it took.

Mr. Tyler: It is a fair point, but my basic point is that if we decide that we can provide a good service to the country as a whole—we are not just constituency Members; we are members of the UK Parliament as well—surely we should be given some flexibility. It is extraordinary that it appears as though we will be bribed to spend less time in the facilities in which we have recently invested in this place.

There is another more critical issue. What is the prime function of a Member of the House of Commons? What would Edmund Burke say about the suggestion that we should scatter ourselves throughout the country by spending more time with our constituents and that our staff should, too? That would mean that we would not fulfil our role in the House and such an assumption is way beyond the remit of the SSRB. As I understand it, no Member gave evidence on this issue simply because it did not arise at the time of the original review.

Ministers might be only too happy to see some Government Back Benchers and more Opposition Members spending more time in their constituencies. I understand that the Government did not give evidence to that effect; it was given by those mysterious people—the authorities of the House. It is extremely important that we deal with the issues carefully and consider them in the round.

My Liberal Democrat colleagues will have a completely unwhipped vote on the issue, but I must say that I am attracted by cross-party amendment (g). It is also probably helpful to retain what I think is paragraph 6 rather than to push amendment (h) to a conclusion. However—and it is an incredibly important point—if the Opposition parties are to be denied the resources to do our job in the House properly, I hope that the Government recognise that we shall have to review the Short money; otherwise we will simply be prevented from doing our job properly in holding them to account. In the long run, there will not be a reduction in the taxpayers' provision.

I shall deal speedily with paragraphs 2 and 3 on information technology and the London supplement. They are tidying-up and sensible provisions. They may not be as generous as everyone thinks or would like to accept, but they make good progress.

On car mileage, I recognise that some Members, especially those with large and scattered constituencies such as mine and those who have seen the value of their cars depreciate very quickly as they travel thousands and thousands of miles and way beyond what most people in our comparator occupations travel, have a valid point. Most MPs are now faced with a system that fails to assist with the capital cost of an essential working tool for our job. That is not necessarily the case with some of the comparators.

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill) and my hon. Friend the Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey) made a very important point about the tax significance of that additional sum over and above the Inland Revenue rate.

Sir John Butterfill: Is the hon. Gentleman also aware that it is by no means clear who asked the SSRB to consider this item? In fact, I understand that the recommendation came as a shock to Ministers and the Cabinet Office. They had no idea that it was going to arise, which is why nobody gave evidence. There is just a sneaking suspicion that the provenance of this suggestion may rest with the Treasury at the instigation of the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Tyler: Well, what a surprise! I am grateful for that revelation, because it encourages me in my view that the SSRB has been asked to go well outside its original terms of reference on this issue.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Tyler: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me, but I wish to make progress.

As I understand it, the Inland Revenue rate was decided three or four years ago, even though it was implemented only recently. It completely fails to take into account the considerable increases in fuel costs in recent years. There is a difficulty with that.

It may be that for quite different reasons—for environmental policy reasons or to lead opinion on the issue—the Government recommended that there should be a change. However, I see no logic to the SSRB coming forward with the recommendation. I want a firm commitment that the Inland Revenue rate will be uprated by the time of the next Budget to take into account the additional costs before I am persuaded that the proposal is logical.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Tyler: I shall give way once more.

Mr. Burnett: I sincerely hope that my hon. Friend means that if the Inland Revenue rate is uprated, that will benefit not just Members of the House but the country generally.

Mr. Tyler: Of course, that is axiomatic. Someone said earlier that we were in a privileged position, but we are not. Everyone is in the same position and we all pay tax on everything over and above the minimal level.

I understand the argument that the incidental expenses provision should be referred to the Members Estimate Committee. That view has some merit. I see from the many issues that have already arisen in the debate that an input from Members, based on their practical experience, would be helpful. However, Members are entitled to know what the remit, limitations and constraints of that investigation would be. Will the SSRB's basic objectives be accepted, and what is the time scale for producing the conclusions and implementing them? What will happen in the interim?

I turn now to parliamentary pensions, and I suppose I should now declare an interest. However, given the convoluted discussion that took place earlier, I am not sure how I am affected. Nevertheless, we are all affected to some extent. I accept that it was unfortunate that the long process to persuade or encourage us to engage in adequate saving arrangements in the late 1990s or the early part of this century meant that, when we eventually got round to improving the terms, the world had moved on. It looked as though we were totally out of synch with comparators in other occupations. That creates a difficulty, and I understand the problem and the suggestion from the Leader of the House and the SSRB that there should be some "phased recovery". I have the greatest confidence in our trustees, but some issues have not been properly addressed.

I hope that the Leader of the House will give us a specific assurance that the situation will not set a precedent for going back on explicit promises made to Members only a short time ago about the way in which the rate of contributions will be handled. The fact that the provision is retrospective and will apply from April 2004 also sets an unfortunate precedent. We usually say that we do not want the House to implement retrospective legislation, and I hope that that situation will usually apply to us. Members will face an effective increase of 2 per cent. because the 1 per cent. provision will apply to only six months in the current year.

I entirely agree with the reasonable and equitable improvements suggested for beneficiaries. However, pensionable age remains a fraught question, and there is no way that we are dispelling worries about that today—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) has obviously indicated that that is the case. We should bring ourselves into line with people in comparable occupations, but, as has been pointed out, hon. Members, especially those in marginal seats, are not encouraged by the leaders of their parties—not even the leader of my party—let alone the Whips, to say on their 65th birthday, "I'm off, friends."

I hope that the Leader of the House will carefully examine the way in which the SSRB was asked to conduct this review. I take up a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Devon. The SSRB made a set of proposals that were unrelated to the matters that hon. Members thought were on the table, so there was no consultation on major changes that will affect the way in which we try to serve the country and our constituencies. That has weakened the package—perhaps disastrously. Although I would hope that an SSRB package would normally receive overwhelming cross-party support when debated on the Floor, on this occasion the SSRB has either been let down, or has let us down—I am not prepared to judge which. Yes, it has an important role to play, but it is not right that it should advance principles about the way in which Parliament operates that are outwith its terms of reference.

2.52 pm

Ian Stewart (Eccles) (Lab): I am pleased to be called to speak in the debate. There are 659 Members of Parliament, so the Members' service has 659 different shapes. I speak for myself on the basis of my experience. I can tell you at the outset, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that if I retain the confidence of the people of Eccles at the next general election and they return me to this place, I shall make an even bigger effort to assist the authorities with their future deliberations on the question of what I call the "MPs' parliamentary service" by submitting oral evidence to the Senior Salaries Review Body. That service ranges from a Member's role in the core aims of the service to the way in which the service is delivered across locations. To be frank, I do not think that we do enough to raise public awareness about such matters and although I accept that each individual Member must decide the most appropriate shape of service for his or her constituency, there are overarching issues which the House can, and must, address. Nevertheless, I support the system through which the independent SSRB reviews such issues as Members' pay and allowances.

I thank the SSRB for its comprehensive report. I understand that some members of the body may be in the Public Gallery today, so I hope that the debate will further their understanding of the many varied factors behind the 659 different approaches employed by Members to deliver such a complex and important service. I also thank the body for agreeing to hear my oral evidence in support of the written evidence that I submitted. Although I am pleased that my request to the SSRB bore fruit, I am sad to report that on two occasions, the former Speaker's Panel on Members' Allowances refused my request for a meeting and did not offer any solution to the problem with the staffing budget that I had highlighted. I thus have great hopes that the new Members Estimate Committee will be much more transparent, accessible and responsive to Members.

I had a lively and stimulating session with the SSRB, which I thoroughly enjoyed. As I have given written and oral evidence to the 2001 and the 2004 review boards, I have come to realise that while my motive for attending the sessions was to ensure that the body understood my views, I also gained clarification on, and a better understanding of, the issues that arose from our joint exchanges.

Like many hon. Members, I have an office in Westminster and one in my constituency. I employ 2.5 members of staff, who are individual members of the Transport and General Workers Union parliamentary branch, which is based in the House. I would like to increase that complement to three full-time equivalent workers. As you are aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have deep roots in the trade union movement as a lifelong TGWU member. I take the view that if there is an identified formal job to be done, someone should be employed to do it and paid at the right rate for it. I should point out that although I am a proud trade union member, I have consistently put forward my views on the basis that I want to be a Member of Parliament who is also a good employer. That is imperative if I am to deliver the service that my constituents deserve.

To deliver that service, we need not only good equipment, but caseworkers, researchers and, of course, the much maligned administrators. I welcome the increase in the staffing budget because I hope that it will go a significant way towards enabling us to employ the three full-time equivalent members of staff that the SSRB recommends at decent and appropriate salary levels. I welcome the SSRB recommendation that the extra pay intended for staff based in London be recognised in their pay ranges.

I am sorry to say, however, that the problem with the staffing budget remains. In my submission to the SSRB, I argued for the abolition of the anomalous cap on staff salaries. I said that the numbers of staff allowed, after account was taken of the criteria outlined by the House and proper staff evaluation, would create a natural cap in the existing system, and I remain concerned. When the previous report was produced, the House's Department of Finance and Administration circulated to us, as employers, the recommended salary scales for each grade of staff. However, the increase in the staffing allowance that we have received each year since then has met only the cost of inflation. Although I have been able to give my staff a pay increase to cover rising costs, I have not been able to allow them to progress up the salary scales. If I were to do that as the SSRB and the Department of Finance and Administration intended, I would have to pay staff at less than the appropriate grade for their qualifications, experience and duties, or employ fewer than three members of staff, which I believe provides a lesser service than my constituents deserve.

I doubt that many members of staff are on the top level for posts such as senior parliamentary assistant. The SSRB and the Department of Finance and Administration recommend a rate of £34,300 for such staff based in London. I am certainly unable to pay that amount. I am sure that many of us have experienced and long serving staff, but we just cannot pay them the highest salaries, even when that is appropriate. We do not have the money to do so because the staffing budget has an artificial cap, which means that if an experienced member of staff meets the criteria laid down in the 2001 SSRB report for the highest grade and if the MP, after proper evaluation, agrees to pay that level of salary, he or she must depress the salary levels of the other two full-time equivalent members of staff or alternatively be forced, like me, to consider employing fewer than three members of staff. The system is perverse.

I hope that the SSRB recommendation to increase our staff budget from £66,450 to £72,000 for Members outside London will help us to make progress on the issue. However, the matter requires further investigation and is still to be resolved. I note that the SSRB recommends a review of job descriptions and pay ranges for caseworkers, which I would support. That should give us a firm basis on which to resolve the matter, and I am happy to assist the Members Estimate Committee or any other appropriate body in order to do so.

It is well known that I take an interest in the provision of information technology equipment. The implementation of the SSRB recommendations in 2001 was undoubtedly a significant step forward. I am glad that the board is unequivocal in advocating that every MP should be provided with three work stations in addition to their own, which is an acknowledgement that we need three full-time equivalent members of staff. However, we must address the increasing use of pervasive technology such as modern mobile phones that can be used as mini-computers. As I have told Mr. Speaker, I am happy to carry out a pilot, and I shall contact him separately on the matter. We need a designated MP IT service unit. Every Government and parliamentary department has its own designated IT unit, and it is not acceptable in this day and age that MPs should have no such support or back-up.

Turning to SSRB recommendations with which I do not agree, I appreciate that pressure on the parliamentary estate has led to proposals for hot-desking. As I have already said, there is great pressure on MPs to take on interns and other temporary staff, but hot-desking is not the answer. Caseworkers generally need access to hard-copy information, particularly in immigration and asylum cases. They cannot work just anywhere, if for no other reason than to preserve confidentiality. I am on record as predicting that electronically received constituency casework will increase over the next five to 10 years, which means that MPs will have to employ more staff. However, although e-mail casework is increasing, my constituents are far from emailing me as a matter of routine. Constituents with problems still tend to use a small size of ruled writing paper—so much so, in fact, that I think the pad is passed round the constituency. Our constituents expect confidentiality, which must not be compromised. Hot-desking will not solve the ever-increasing need for space for MPs' services on the parliamentary estate. However, the House must be frank with the public and explain why we need certain resources to deliver a modern and effective service. The more accessible and effective Members' services are, the greater the need for adequate and appropriate resources. We should not shirk that responsibility, and we should be frank with the public.

As the initiator of the "ADAPT" learning project, which has subsequently developed into the parliamentary learning project, I was pleased that the SSRB highlighted the key role of training for staff and, indeed, Members. However, constituency staff are the Cinderellas of the field, so more must be done to allow them access to high-quality training and support. We need to develop the parliamentary learning project to deliver core training for Members' services, including the use of the internet-based distance learning system originally envisaged in 1998.

I shall conclude with a provision that affects our constituencies. I am concerned about the recommendation on the one hand to increase the incidental expenses provision to £27,500 while on the other hand clawing back or slicing off some of that money from Members who employ one or more staff members in London. That detrimental change could lead to a massive deficit that might destabilise our services. My local authority has argued with the Government that a reduction in the overall population does not necessarily lead to a reduction in the cost of providing services. I believe that the same principle applies to Members' services. Once a Member has an office in their constituency, fixed costs for rental and heating apply whether they have one or more members of staff. I also oppose any reduction in the facilities available in the House, as it is self-evident that that is not in my constituents' interests. I hope that my recommendation will be remitted to the Members Estimate Committee so that it can find a more acceptable way forward. I shall therefore support the proposals on the provision of incidental expenses tabled by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

I have not yet addressed the recommendations on Members' pay. The SSRB reports that it received no submissions from MPs proposing that their pay be increased. I gave oral evidence to the SSRB and, on both occasions, I declined when I was asked if I wished to comment on Members' pay. To date, I have been happy with an inflation-proof increase on an annual basis. The next SSRB report is scheduled for 2006, but I thank the board for its present report. While I do not agree with all of it, it is lucid and easy to read. I hope that some of its key recommendations will command the support of the House, and I welcome the fact that it will be referred back to deal with the concerns that I have highlighted, namely hot-desking and the proposals on the incidental expenses provision.

3.6 pm

Mr. Richard Page (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): I wish to speak in support of amendment (g). The Leader of the House and my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) can relax, as I do not propose to speak to amendment (h) or press it to a vote.

I am exceedingly grateful to right hon. and hon. Members who have supported amendment (g). Like the right hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), I belong to the select band of Members who, after 28 years of service, will not stand at the next election, so I can press amendments without fear or favour. I tabled the amendment because I am concerned that the House is getting into a bit of a muddle. When I leave, I want to be sure that everything is sweetness and light and runs properly. At the outset, however, I should make it clear that I am not critical of the way in which the SSRB has determined its figures. Whatever mysterious method it uses, I have no quarrel with the total sum. However, the money should be divided equally between all Members of Parliament and, as elected representatives, we should take responsibility for the way in which the allowance is spent, subject to approval from Finance and Administration that it has been correctly spent.

I said that the House is getting into a bit of a muddle—after all the years that I have spent here, I recognise a slippery slope when I see one. I am not sure whether the figure of £7,000 is a bonus or penalty, but it is the start of a slippery slope. I am not sure where it will lead, but I fear that it will further diminish the standing of Parliament. I am afeard that that £7,000 will force MPs to do not what they want to do, but what the allowances direct them to do.

Miss Widdecombe: Will my hon. Friend comment on the farcical situation that would ensue? Members of Parliament would be so penalised by the rule of £7,500 per work station that they would end up—as I would—with insufficient money to pay the rent for their constituency office, which is the exact opposite of the intended effect of the proposals.

Mr. Page: My right hon. Friend, who had the wit and wisdom to support my amendment, makes a valid point. We must return to a clearer and simpler system, so that we avoid those difficulties. One or two hon. Members have said that the SSRB should stop trying to engineer accommodation in the House and stick to its overall task.

Mr. McLoughlin: Does my hon. Friend accept that another problem with the recommendations in the SSRB report is that, now that allowances are to be published each year, the very fact that certain Members will be able to claim £27,000 in incidental expenses provision while other Members will perhaps be able to claim only £5,000 may give the public a very distorted view of what is being claimed or the benefit that a Member of Parliament is getting?

Mr. Page: One of the advantages of speaking so late in a debate about one's own amendment is that it will have been trawled and trampled over, and generally explained to everybody to the nth degree. In fact, I wonder why I am speaking to amendment (g) at all. Apart from the Leader of the House, who got himself into such a muddle trying to answer questions about these matters, everybody agrees that the amendment is a good thing. Perhaps I should sit down and leave it at that, but I have never known a Member of Parliament not use some words when the opportunity to do so is available. As my time is running out in this place and this is such an opportunity, I should like to say just a little bit more, but I promise that it will be only a little bit.

The main purpose of amendment (g) is to restore to Members the right to restructure their offices however they think best in order for them to carry out their parliamentary and constituency duties. That is the raison d'être of the amendment. As has been mentioned, prior to 2001 all Members were treated equally with regard to allowances. Many aspects of those reforms were welcome, but in my view they started this very unhelpful trend towards ending the uniformity of allowances for Members and introducing an element of persuading Members, by the allowances that were available, to restructure their offices in a particular way that was not their way, but the allowances' way. The £7,000 would accelerate that trend.

I welcome the greater transparency in laying down and publicising Members' allowances, but I think that, in order to be believable—this relates to the point that my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) has just made—those allowances must be made irrespective of where Members' constituencies are and of whether and where they have decided to have a principal office. First, we had extra allowances for Members with London constituencies, and now Members who choose to base their staff in Westminster rather than in their constituency will, if the proposals are agreed to, have their allowances reduced. It is not a fair comparison. We have all had media interest in our various allowances, and we have had it to a greater degree over the past few weeks.

More importantly, I strongly believe that Members should not be subject to financial pressures in deciding how best to structure their offices in order to do the best job for their constituents. They have to stand up in front of their constituents at the election, and I believe that they should not be subject to outside pressures telling them how they should have been running their affairs. As the House will know, the unique nature of each constituency means that there cannot be such a one-size-fits-all arrangement for Members' offices. The Leader of the House accepted that view when he delicately accepted—I was about to say dodged, but perhaps I shall withdraw that—the points made by hon. Members on this matter.

I shall not expand on that point, except to give just one example. On the day when the list of MPs' expenses was published, the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso)—I did not tell him that I would mention him in the debate, but I do not believe that he will be upset, because what I have to say is in no way critical—said that he had chosen not to have a fixed office in his constituency on account of the huge geographical area that it covers and the distances between its various towns and villages. Instead, he chooses to travel to his constituents and receive logistical support from his Westminster-based staff. If that is the arrangement that he wants, it is the arrangement that he should have. There should be flexibility in the allowance system to enable him to do exactly that. I believe that the review body's proposals would unfairly penalise those with such arrangements.

Ian Stewart: Does the hon. Gentleman remember that in the 2001 report and the subsequent debate, a special circumstances allowance was referred to? To date, we know of no hon. Member who has applied—I am aware that some have done so—who has achieved any success from that allowance.

Mr. Page: I am not responsible for who gets or does not get any of these so-called special allowances. I believe that there should be an overall, even amount for Members of Parliament, and that it is for them alone to decide how that money is spent.

In short, Members have widely different responsibilities and constituents' needs, and the allowance should give maximum flexibility in office arrangements. Amendment (g) would be easy to administer and control, and would ensure that responsibility is where it should be—with the Member.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Although the length of time for debate is not fixed from the Chair, I am anxious that there are a number of what might be called stakeholders who will expect to contribute to the debate. May I please appeal now for extreme brevity, as we need a winding-up speech at the end of the debate, and there is not a lot of time left?

3.16 pm

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): I should like to speak in favour of the main motion, which largely reflects the recommendations of the SSRB.

I want also to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart) in initiating the Adapt project, which has led to some extremely valuable training provision for our staff. My staff have found that training extremely useful and valuable, and it has also been valuable to me as a Member. The work that he did was pioneering stuff, and I congratulate him on it. I assure him that the Members' advisory panel carefully considered his submission to us; although we did not call him to give evidence, that submission was extensively considered, and I am sorry that we were unable to follow through the recommendation.

The amendments raise some issues that I would like to address. I oppose amendment (g), which was tabled by the hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page), because I think that it breaks an important principle that was introduced after the 2001 election.

[Mrs. Anne Campbell]

The principle was introduced because it was feared that many members of staff were not being employed under proper terms and conditions. The work done by the Speaker's advisory panel and now the Members' advisory panel, which I chair, led to the introduction of a standard contract for all employed staff, standard pay scales and a staff salaries budget, which was ring-fenced, so that it is in no one's interest to pay their staff poverty wages.

Mr. McWalter: My hon. Friend makes a good point. I agree with her in principle, but as she heard my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles say, there is now no scope for giving proper increments to experienced staff year on year. As I read it, amendment (g) would allow us to do that very thing.

Mrs. Campbell: We are always going to get to a point at which the maximum is reached. It is inherent in the capping procedure that once staff salaries total the maximum, it is not possible to pay increments in addition to inflationary allowances. That is one of the difficulties that we have to accept. Staff turnover is rapid, so one can start new staff at the bottom of the scale and pay increments to other staff, but we all face that difficulty.

Mr. Tyler: Will the hon. Lady accept that if the motion is passed hon. Members will be encouraged to employ interns, partially qualified staff, untrained staff or part-time staff, which she apparently wants to do, rather than maintaining professional staff in the House?

Mrs. Campbell: We must all make a judgment on that, but we all understand the importance of employing permanent staff. I would find it difficult to staff my office entirely, or even mainly, with interns and voluntary staff.

Mr. Dobson: A substantial number of hon. Members supplement the existing money for salaries by taking money from the incidental expenses provision. They do so because they like to give increments to staff, some of whom have worked for them for more than 20 years, and because they like to reward their staff, if their staff undergo training. If they continue that practice and exercise their judgment that their staff should be in their parliamentary estate office, they will not be able to do the other things for which IEP provides, because they will have only £5,000.

Mrs. Campbell: I understand my right hon. Friend's point and do not pretend that the SSRB's recommendations are entirely satisfactory. I use the example to speak against amendment (g), which erodes the important principle that staff salaries should be ring-fenced. Together with the changes to staff pension arrangements, we have put staff employment on a proper and fair footing, and I do not want to see the erosion of that principle.

It is, of course, possible to transfer money into salaries from IEP, but not the reverse, which amendment (g) would allow, and we should hold fast to that principle. I realise that amendment (g) was tabled for good reasons and that it is simpler than the proposal advanced by the SSRB. However, it is better to increase IEP and allow hon. Members to transfer some of it to staff salaries, which they may do now, than to transfer money from staff salaries to IEP, so I cannot support the amendment afternoon.

On the main proposal, I welcome the modest increase in the staff budget. Paragraph 4.9, table 4.3 in the SSRB report makes it clear that most hon. Members spend all of their staff salaries allowance. I personally welcome the extra, which will enable me to reward my staff a little more generously for what they do. I need to employ my full complement of three staff, all of whom work on constituency casework. I do not employ staff to conduct research here because the casework load is so heavy that I need three staff to do it—I can also find plenty of work for the various interns and volunteers who pass through my office. My staff serve me well—they perform an essential service and are much appreciated by my constituents. However, a new rule to increase IEP for those hon. Members with constituency offices and to reduce it for members of staff based at Westminster would present many of us with a conundrum.

Earlier, I referred to the important question of how workstations would count under amendment (g) towards reducing the allowance. I would certainly base my workstation here in the House, which is where I do most of my work, but I do not use it when I sit in this Chamber, for example, and therefore consider it to be available to a member of staff. That addresses the point raised by the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) about two members of staff being the norm. One could have a staff workstation and a Member's workstation, in which case two members of staff could be employed for about the same IEP as they are currently.

Miss Widdecombe: This is Monty Python stuff. The hon. Lady's answer is that we should get round the problem not by decreasing the burden on the parliamentary estate but by fiddling how we define "workstation"—forget it.

Mrs. Campbell: I object to the use of the word "fiddling". Examining the allocation of workstations is not fiddling.

Amendment (c) concerns mileage allowances, which I have always considered absurdly generous, possibly because I do not own a car and therefore have rarely had the opportunity to claim them. We should encourage hon. Members to use environmentally friendly means of travel, and the private car does not fall into that category. I appreciate that my constituency is small, that I can get around it by bicycle, on foot and by bus, and that many hon. Members cannot do that, but the current mileage allowance is far too high.

I use a taxi when it is raining, blowing or snowing, which makes a bicycle impractical. Ironically, the current mileage allowance pays about one third of the cost of a taxi. We have recently introduced the possibility of claiming the full amount from IEP, provided that receipts are produced, but because I always spend my IEP—in most years, I exceed it by a quite a large amount—I cannot use that solution. If IEP were to increase, it would allow me to use some of my allowance to pay for taxis, when they are necessary.

I appreciate that many hon. Members will be caused difficulty by a rapid reduction in the mileage allowance from 57.7p a mile to 40p a mile, and we must examine how to introduce that reduction gradually rather than very quickly. I do not support amendment (c), because the Inland Revenue rate has not been increased for many years, and I presume that it would take a long time for its rate—40p per mile—to catch up with the 57.7p that we pay Members now.

Sir John Butterfill: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is clear that it will not be possible for my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) to speak to his amendment. Will he be able to move it formally, when time is up?

Furthermore, I shall be unable to say anything about the pension fund, which hon. Members wanted to be explained to them. Can the Leader of the House arrange another occasion for me to do that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is now apparent that not all those whom I identified as wanting to speak are likely to be able to contribute. However, that has no negative effect on the ability to put Questions at the end of the debate.

Mr. Salmond: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not in order for the Leader of the House to move that the debate be deferred or extended, so that these matters can be decided after having been debated?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter that I can determine. The House determined the timing of the debates yesterday on a motion tabled by the Leader of the House, and I do not think that we shall see any change now.

Mrs. Campbell: I was about to wind up, as I have nothing else to say. I shall listen carefully to what others say.

3.30 pm

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I am grateful to be called to speak briefly to my amendment (c). I am not frightened of putting my head above the parapet when I believe that it is necessary to gain justice and fairness for Members of Parliament.

I remind the House that Members of Parliament have entered into leasing or hire purchase agreements on cars, or have found other ways to have the use of a car, and they cannot change such arrangements, which might last for up to five years. I believe that it is unreasonable to reduce dramatically the rate of mileage allowance available to Members from the present rate of 57.7p per mile, which is low compared with what we used to have. The purpose of my amendment is to freeze the allowance at the present rate until the Inland Revenue rate—40p per mile at present—has caught up.

We have already heard that the Inland Revenue rate is based on no understood criteria and has not been increased for a number of years, despite the fact that motoring costs, particularly fuel costs, have increased dramatically in the past four or five years. The Leader of the House knows that in the last two or three months alone the cost of petrol and diesel has increased by 7p or 8p per litre. It would be an injustice not to reflect that in the mileage allowance that Members are able to claim.

Mr. Heath: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I shall in a moment.

We have agreed to have no increase in salary this year, other than the inflation increase. At April 2003, the median salary of the typical private sector comparator was £68,000, and that of the typical public sector comparator was £65,000. Our salary is £57,500, so our earnings are well below those of the comparators with which we are supposed to be matched. It is therefore unfair that from 1 April next year Members of Parliament face a dramatically reduced mileage allowance, which bears no resemblance to the true cost of motoring. I understand that Members who travel 20,000 miles a year will lose £3,600 from their income. Is that fair? I do not believe that it is.

Mr. Heath: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am sorry, but I have been advised to keep going because of the time. I apologise profusely to the hon. Gentleman.

I wish to draw the House's attention to the threshold. My constituency is about 180 miles from London. My wife and I generally, but not always, travel to London by car rather than by train, because doing so enables us to do our job in our constituencies better—we are able to attend more meetings and meet more constituents. Every time we do that journey, we save the taxpayer £380. I get only a modest allowance for travelling by car, so I already subsidise every mile that I travel on constituency or parliamentary duties. I hope that the Leader of the House will say that my amendment will be decided on a genuinely free vote. It is wrong that Members of Parliament should so heavily subsidise their parliamentary activities. I feel very deeply about this. I am delighted that my amendment has received support from the Labour party—the Government party—the Liberal Democrat party, the Democratic Unionist party, and Her Majesty's Opposition: the Conservative and Unionist party.

I ask only for fairness. There has been a huge rise in the cost of motoring. In my constituency, it is 26 miles from north to south and 16 miles from east to west. I attend numerous events. We do not have the public transport that the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) appears to have. I cannot get from the north to the south of my constituency by public transport or, for that matter, by bicycle, unless I spend a huge amount of time that reduces the time available to serve my constituents.

I say this to the Leader of the House: please let us have justice for people who seek to do a good job and to use their car only when it is necessary to do so in support of their parliamentary activities. The Senior Salaries Review Body is abusing its position by interfering in this matter, which has nothing whatever to do with it. Why it did it I do not know. I see the damp hand of the Inland Revenue; that is deeply regrettable.

[Sir Nicholas Winterton]

Members of Parliament have faced the situation that all their allowances were published in the tabloid press and elsewhere—let us give them a fair crack of the whip. I have been in this place for 33 years. I worship this House and believe that it is the best Parliament in the world. Let us not undermine the role of Members of Parliament by undermining their ability to do the job that they are here to do.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for being so kind in trying to call Members who have moved amendments.

I am afraid that I must disagree with the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), although I do so with respect for his position. He says that motoring costs have risen substantially, but Department for Transport figures show that they have decreased by 4.8 per cent. since 1997. I do not agree that 57p is the appropriate rate for mileage. The recommendation in the report is right on environmental grounds. Paragraph 4.51 explains why the rate was chosen and says that it includes depreciation, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey). It states:

> "We received no evidence to justify why MPs should be entitled to a more advantageous rate", and that it

> "sets a bad environmental example by encouraging and rewarding car use."

If Members feel disadvantaged, they have, as the Leader of the House said, the option of switching to a cleaner, greener car. I endorse his view. I hope that he will have had some sway with his colleagues, and that if amendment (c) is carried, he will support my amendment (i).

The proposal on parking charges was not in the report but was subsequently inserted into the motion. There would have to be strict controls on how that is applied. For example, it costs £40 a day to park in short-term parking at Heathrow airport. No doubt Members could make the case that that was necessary in the performance of their duties, but it would not be good value for the taxpayer.

I will not take up any more of the House's time, although there is a lot more that I could say. If amendment (c) is accepted, I will move amendment (i).

3.39 pm

Sir John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) (Con): The trustees and I support the amendments that relate to the pension fund. We agreed to the increase in Members' contribution when we changed the accrual rate. The increase of 1 per cent. goes one further step—almost all the way—to paying for that. Perhaps when the next actuarial valuation is made, a further increase will not be necessary. However, we shall not know that until the Government Actuary's Department conducts its valuation.

The package of measures that relate to pensions for widows, widowers and surviving unmarried partners and the payment for life of pensions to widows, widowers and unmarried partners is generally available throughout the country in pension schemes in the public and private sectors, and I fully support it. The need to make that cost neutral influences the idea that we should forgo our early retirement rights. I suggested that in a debate when we discussed forces pensions. It is right and proper that we should fall into line with what is happening elsewhere in society and in the public sector.

The change needs to be phased in, however. The Government's proposal would lead to a process of phasing in which I shall try to explain briefly. For new Members of Parliament, there will be no right to retire before the age of 65 without a diminution calculated by the Government Actuary. All existing Members will have some benefit. Those who retire in 2009 or the day after the general election after next will not be affected. After that, there will be a sliding scale whereby the actuarial factor is diminished to take account of Members' length of service so that they will not pay the full actuarial reduction but some actuarial reduction, tempered by a table that my fellow trustees and I, together with the Leader of the House and the Government Actuary, will construct. We will send full details of that to all hon. Members as soon as they are available. However, no existing Members will have a full actuarial reduction if they retire before they are 65.

3.42 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): I understand that time is pressing. With the exception of the contribution of the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill), whose expertise I respect, much of the rest of the SSRB's report is a dog's breakfast. I believe that that is due to a lack of familiarity with some of the detail of the allowances. The Leader of the House would have been better advised to refer the SSRB report in its entirety, rather than only one aspect of it, to the Members Estimate Committee. That would have been better for the treatment of the recommendations and, I suspect, for the outcome.

I want to speak for one minute on a small matter. It is frustrating that I have failed to get it progressed. Perhaps it is a symptom of our treatment of such issues that something so minor has not been progressed. The SSRB defines the additional costs allowance as it is described on the House of Commons website. It states that the purpose of the allowance is > "To reimburse Members for costs incurred when staying overnight away from their main home whilst performing Parliamentary duties."

However, the additional costs allowance was brought into being by a motion in December 1971 and defined specifically as being for parliamentary duties in London or the constituency. At that time, there was no National Assembly for Wales or Scottish Parliament. For a small number in the north of Scotland and perhaps in rural Wales, it is often physically impossible to carry out parliamentary duties with Scottish or Welsh Ministers or, indeed, Westminster Ministers when they are visiting the relevant Parliament, without staying overnight, away from home.

The Fees Office solution, which is bound by a previous resolution, is to tell Members to claim out of their IEP. However, it is clear from the SSRB report that IEP is not designed to pay for Members' overnight expenses. The additional costs allowance should do that. I am not asking for an increase in the allowance, merely for the ability to claim from the correct allowance for meeting a Minister in the Scottish Parliament or the National Assembly for Wales instead of being told to claim from an allowance that was not designed for that purpose.

This affects a very small number of Members, but I would have thought that it was a very simple matter to resolve. I had a meeting with the Leader of the House last year to attempt to progress it, and I find it highly frustrating that something so simple, so clear and so obvious cannot be done to bring the House up to date in regard to its expenses provision. I strongly suspect that, if the SSRB were more familiar with the nature of our allowances, it would have had no objection whatever to my proposal. I therefore hope that the Members Estimate Committee will, if the House decides to charge it with considering these matters, introduce this minor amendment. It would make life for a few Members much easier by bringing the allowances into line with what they were originally intended to do, and by bringing them into terms with reality.

3.45 pm

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): I thank all the right hon. and hon. Members who have contributed to the debate, not only this afternoon but in the extensive work that they have done before. Members such as the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill) and my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) have put in a huge amount of time and effort on behalf of us all—often without thanks, as we have seen this afternoon. I thank them and all the other Members who have taken part.

I emphasise that, as this is a House matter, this will be a free vote for Back Benchers on this side and, I know, on the Opposition side—[Interruption.] If hon. Members will be patient, I shall explain. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has a duty to put forward the recommendations of the independent report from the SSRB, which the House commissioned. He cannot cherry-pick, should not cherry-pick, and has not cherry-picked the recommendations. This is an independent report and it is presented to us to ensure that the integrity of the House is maintained.

I want to go through some of the arguments in favour of the motion and against the amendments—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) would stop chuntering, he might find that he has some sympathy with what I have to say—[Interruption.] He is chuntering and chattering, as is normally the case. As I was saying, it is incumbent on us to put these recommendations before the House. As the Leader of the House acknowledged, there is some difficulty in regard to the recommendations on incidental expenses provisions. The SSRB report recognises that some of the matters that it has been asked to deal with—it is the House that asked it to do so—go beyond the remit of considering Members' pay and allowances. Of course, there is an interaction between office accommodation, incidental expenses and staff allowances. It is also a fact—a harsh one—that the parliamentary estate is very crowded, and that has to be taken into account.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) made the point that there was discrimination under the current system. His worry was that the proposed new system would introduce another kind of discrimination, and that two wrongs would not make a right. That is exactly why my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has asked for a deviation from the SSRB recommendation in this one regard, by asking the Members Estimate Committee to consider this matter. He has done so because the matter is not exclusively about salaries and allowances.

Amendment (g), which has the advantage of simplicity, has been supported by hon. Members on both sides. It contains a carrot, in that it would redress the discrimination against those Members who lose out by not having staff on the parliamentary estate, but it does not provide the stick, in terms of an incentive to bear down on the staff. I am not arguing that it should do that, or that it should not. I am pointing out that the choice has been put before the House. Hon. Members should bear in mind the fact—as the House authorities, the Leader of the House and I have to—that none of these things come without a cost. We do not know the exact cost of amendment (g), but we estimate it at between £2 million and £3 million. However, we must acknowledge in our deliberations the fact that we are in a unique situation in deciding our own pay and allowances. I am grateful for the indication that amendment (h) will not be pushed to the vote.

On mileage, the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) has pointed out the shock impact of the proposal, in that Members who use cars will lose money. On the other hand, the House has to balance whether it wishes to accept the independence of the SSRB report and the fact that our mileage allowances are better than those for members of the public. If there are problems with the Inland Revenue rates, I suggest that hon. Members take that up with the Government and the Inland Revenue, not make special pleading for their own case.

On pensions, which are perhaps the most important point, it is clear that the increase in the fund is provided by Members' contributions. This is not feather-bedding by the Exchequer; Members' salaries pay those contributions, which sets a good example. However, I believe that we have a moral, as well as a political and financial, obligation to accept these recommendations that the trustees all supported.

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings, pursuant to Order [2 November].

Amendment proposed: (g), in line 9, leave out from first 'to' to 'and' in line 11 and insert—

"£80,460 for all Members with up to 10 per cent. of the Staffing Allowance being available to fund a Member's office in his or her constituency.".—[Mr. Page.]

Question accordingly negatived.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House notes the recommendations made in Chapter 4 of the report of the Review Body on Senior Salaries on parliamentary pay and allowances (Cm 6354-I) a copy of which was laid before this House on 21st October; and is of the opinion that the provisions set out in paragraphs (2) to (5) below should be implemented, subject to any decisions of the Members Estimate Committee with regard to their application.

Staffing Allowance

(2) With effect from 1st April 2005, the Staffing Allowance should be increased to £80,460 for all Members with up to 10 per cent. of the Staffing Allowance being available to fund a Member's office in his or her constituency; and these sums should be adjusted on 1st April each year (beginning on 1st April 2005) in line with the Average Earnings Index for public and private sectors combined.

IT Provision

(3) With effect from the beginning of the next Parliament, the level of provision of IT equipment and support should be increased in line with recommendations 11 and 12 of the Review Body's report (Cm 6354-I).

London Supplement

(4) With effect from 1st April 2005, the London Supplement should be increased to £2,500, and this sum should be adjusted on 1st April each year (beginning on 1st April 2005) in line with the Average Earnings Index for public and private sectors combined; and it should not be payable to any Member who receives the Additional Costs Allowance.

Car Mileage Allowance and Parking

(5) With effect from 1st April 2005, the Car Mileage Allowance should be payable at the same rate as the car mileage rates approved by the Inland Revenue, with the higher rate payable up to a total of 10,000 miles and the lower rate thereafter or as determined in future by the Inland Revenue; and the cost of parking a car, motorcycle or bicycle, if wholly, exclusively and necessarily incurred in the performance of parliamentary duties, should be reimbursed.

Incidental Expenses Provision

(6) That recommendation 8 of the Review Body's report (Cm 6354-I) be referred to the House of Commons Members Estimate Committee for further consideration.

PARLIAMENTARY PENSIONS (CONTRIBUTION RATE)

Resolved,

That this House notes recommendation 4 contained in the report of the Review Body on Senior Salaries on parliamentary pay and allowances (Cm 6354-I), a copy of which was laid before this House on 21st October, that the contribution rate to the parliamentary pension scheme for those scheme members who have opted for the 1/40th accrual rate should be increased by 1 per cent. to 10 per cent. with effect from 1st April 2004, and is of the opinion that it should be implemented.—[Mr. Woolas.]

PARLIAMENTARY PENSIONS (SURVIVOR BENEFITS AND EARLY RETIREMENT)

Resolved,

That this House notes recommendation 3 contained in the report of the Review Body on Senior Salaries on parliamentary pay and allowances (Cm 6354-I), a copy of which was laid before this House on 21st October, and is of the opinion that, subject to consultation with the Trustees of the PCPF and the Government Actuary as to the detailed implementation, the proposals set out in paragraphs (1) to (3) below should be adopted as a package which is, overall, at least cost neutral to the Exchequer:

(1) Pensions calculated on the same basis as pensions for widows and widowers should be introduced for surviving unmarried partners of members in service on or after 3rd November 2004.

(2) Pensions for the widows, widowers and unmarried partners of members in service on or after 3rd November 2004 should be payable for life.

(3) The early retirement provisions which permit a member who has accrued at least 15 years service to retire before the age of 65 on favourable terms should be removed for those who become members of the scheme after 3rd November 2004 and phased out for existing members from 1st April 2009, or the day after the general election after next, whichever is the later.—[Mr. Woolas.]

Sessional Orders and Resolutions

4.17 pm

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the Third Report of the Procedure Committee, Session 2002–03, on Sessional Orders and Resolutions, HC 855, and the Government's Response thereto (published as the Committee's Third Special Report of the current Session, HC 613); approves the proposals set out in paragraphs 9, 10 and 25 of the Report for changes in the practice of the House at the beginning of each Session; and, as recommended in paragraph 9(b), makes the following provision:

That all Members of this House who are returned for two or more places in any part of the United Kingdom should choose for which of the places they will serve, within one week after it appears that there is no question about their election for that place.

I had looked forward to seeing headlines in tomorrow's newspapers stating that we had agreed to cut our mileage rates, but somehow I think that that might not happen.

The motion takes note of the Procedure Committee's report on Sessional Orders and resolutions, published last November, and the Government's reply to it. It approves the proposals set out in paragraphs 9, 10 and 25 of the report for changes in the practice of the House at the beginning of the Session. I am grateful to the Procedure Committee, and to its Chairman, for the advice we have been given.

As the Committee's report explains, for nearly 200 years—and longer in some cases—the House has agreed to three orders and three resolutions at the beginning of each Session. They relate to elections, witnesses, the Metropolitan police, and votes and proceedings. The text appears on page 3 of the Committee's report.

Since 1852, these matters have been taken just before the debate on the reply to the Queen's Speech. They are proposed from the Chair without notice, and have occasionally given rise to debate.

At the suggestion of Mr. Speaker, the Procedure Committee conducted a thorough inquiry to consider whether the Sessional Orders and resolutions should be abolished and updated, and came to the very clear conclusion that our traditional practice should change.

First, the Committee considered the First Reading of the Outlawries Bill—a > "Bill for the more effectual preventing of clandestine outlawries"—

that traditionally is taken before the debate on the Queen's Speech as a symbolic assertion of the House's freedom to consider matters of its own choosing. The Committee notes that the practice takes only a few seconds and recommends that it should continue. The Government agree.

Secondly, the Committee considered the Sessional Orders and resolutions on elections, witnesses and the Votes and Proceedings. It found that the resolution about bribery and the provision for Members to withdraw during any debate on any dispute on their return are obsolete and misleading, as responsibility for election offences and disputes now belongs to the courts, not to the House; that the provision about double returns—two Members being returned for the same seat—relates to an event that cannot now take place; that the order for the printing of the Votes and Proceedings—the formal daily minutes of the House—is unnecessary and that the provision that the Speaker should peruse them before they are printed is not normally carried out; and that the resolutions against tampering with witnesses and giving false evidence have some value as statements of intent, but add nothing to the House's powers to deal with contempts or, in the case of tampering with witnesses or the giving of false evidence on oath, the statutory powers. The Committee, therefore, recommends that the passing of the Sessional Orders and resolutions relating to elections, witnesses and the Votes and Proceedings be discontinued. The Government agree. The motion seeks the House's agreement to that change.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I hope that at some stage the Leader of the House will tell us why he thinks that those splendid, if slightly archaic, traditions are in any way harmful. This is beginning to look like yet another of the ghastly modernisations that seem to be becoming commonplace, so rather than simply reading out the traditions as if to say that they are self-evidently a bad thing, will he tell us why he thinks it necessary to do away with them?

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman has no doubt looked carefully at the Procedure Committee's report, so he will know that the Committee recommended the changes—and I agree.

The Committee found that the provision, in the elections order, about Members returned for more than one place is unlikely ever to be needed. It last happened in 1910, but the Committee recommended that the possibility be dealt with once and for all by the House deciding, when agreeing to its report, that all Members who are returned for two or more places in any part of the United Kingdom should choose for which of the places they will serve, within one week after it appears that there is no question about their election for that place. The motion contains that provision.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP) rose—

Mr. Hain: I can assure the House that the provision applies to Members returned to this House for two or more places and would not prevent a Member of this House from belonging to another elected body in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Salmond: The Leader of the House has answered the point I wanted to make. I merely wanted to check that there was no insidious, nefarious scheme to prevent any Member from exercising that right if the electorate so wished. The Leader of the House has reassured me and I rest satisfied.

Mr. Hain: The urgency with which the hon. Gentleman leapt to his feet made me wonder what his future intentions are and where he sees himself sitting in future.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): May I—uniquely—come to the aid of the Leader of the House to respond, through him, to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth)? Mr. Speaker encouraged the Procedure Committee to consider whether the Sessional Orders and resolutions should be retained or abolished. In our informal discussions we came to the view set out in our report that they should be abolished as they are no longer relevant to the modern age in which we live.

Mr. Forth: Ah, the modern age.

Mr. Hain: I shall not rise to the bait held out by the right hon. Gentleman. The Chairman of the Procedure Committee has explained the situation adequately.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House explain the logic of keeping the much-loved Outlawries Bill while abolishing other things? What is the logic behind that?

Mr. Hain: It was a radical-traditionalist coalition, following the Procedure Committee's expert advice.

The Committee felt that although those Sessional Orders and resolutions should go, we should still begin the Session with a reminder of matters that the House considers to be of importance. The Committee recommended that there should be a statement by the Speaker of the duties and responsibilities of Members—possibly, the Committee suggested, the seven principles of public life as set out in the code of conduct—together with historic claims to privilege, including those of freedom of speech and freedom from legal challenge embodied in the Bill of Rights 1689. The motion endorses that proposal.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Given that the Government have had more than a year to consider these matters, does the Leader of the House have a preferred form of words to present to the House? It might be difficult to make a judgment without knowing what is imagined.

Mr. Hain: As will be evident from the terms in which the debate is being put to the House, we are asking the Committee to look into the matter for us.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): That question needs to be answered, and I hope to return to it later if I catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. I listened carefully to the remarks of the Leader of the House about the use of these words at the beginning of a Session, in which he referred to Members. However, the Sessional Orders relate not to Members but to witnesses and people from outside Parliament who should come here to say the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth instead of hiding behind the Osmotherly rules and being economical with the truth. That is the real problem, and he has not addressed it.

Mr. Hain: With all due respect to my hon. Friend, who is a diligent and fine parliamentarian, I think that he has raised a separate issue.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): I am sure that the Leader of the House understands that this is an important issue, because we could be signing up to a document that is a statement of the way in which we should conduct ourselves. Will he assure us that it will be proceeded with on the basis of a proposal to the House and a full opportunity to debate and consult on it? In effect, it will be our constitution and it should not come to us other than after careful consideration so that the Bill of Rights, the freedoms of the House and all the other things are guaranteed.

Mr. Hain: Obviously, Mr. Speaker and the Procedure Committee will need to be consulted on the detailed wording before we move further.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Does the Leader of the House accept that taking the Oath is enough for most of us? We do not want anything else.

Mr. Hain: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, which was well made.

The larger, and more controversial, part of the Procedure Committee's report relates to the Sessional Order on the Metropolitan police and the linked issues of access to Parliament and demonstrations in Parliament square. The Committee finds that the Sessional Order is misleading, since it does not confer any additional legal powers on the police. The Committee recommends that the Government should introduce appropriate legislation to prohibit long-term demonstrations and to ensure that the laws about access are adequate and enforceable.

The Government are well aware of how strongly Members of the House, including Mr. Speaker, feel about this matter. We therefore agree that there needs to be specific legislation that recognises the unique position of Parliament and its surroundings. We will introduce such legislation as soon as parliamentary time allows.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House explain exactly what his proposal means today? Is it a welcome for the suggestion of legislation at an indeterminate point in the future, or does it fundamentally encourage the police to behave and act differently from the way in which they have acted hitherto?

Mr. Hain: I think that my hon. Friend will find the answer to his question in what I am about to say. What is envisaged is a sensible proposal that particularly protects access and the orderly operations of the House.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hain: I will give way to the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), but then I had better make progress so that I can explain what we intend and take questions on it.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): The Leader of the House said that legislation would be introduced as soon as he could find parliamentary time. Will he assure us that it will be introduced within, say, the next six months?

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman knows from the previous positions that he occupied that I cannot anticipate what will be in the Queen's Speech. He knows that there are protocols and restrictions on me, but I have been pretty clear that we will introduce such legislation as soon as parliamentary time allows. We will do that, and it will be sooner rather than later.

There is legislation to deal with disruptive demonstrations in Parliament square. Under section 14 of the Public Order Act 1986, the police can put conditions on assemblies that they believe may cause serious public disorder, serious damage to property or serious damage to the life of the community. We amended the definition of "assembly" in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 to cover two or more persons.

The Government recognise that existing legislation has not provided the police with all the powers they need to control all protests and demonstrations around Parliament. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has carefully considered what more can be done and we propose a new power for the police to give direction to and impose conditions on any protest, demonstration or assembly within the vicinity of Parliament. It will be an offence to fail to comply with a direction. The precise area will be defined in secondary legislation.

There is a difficult balance to be struck. It is a long-standing tradition in this country that people are free to gather together and to demonstrate provided that that they do so within the law. I have exercised those rights to protest, and would defend to the last the rights of others to do so, including in Parliament square. Equally, however, access to Parliament must be maintained and those who work in Parliament should be able to do so free from harassment. We are working on the detail of the new power and will of course ensure that it is compatible with the European convention on human rights.

Mr. Heald rose—

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Hain: I give way to the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald).

Mr. Heald: Will the Leader of the House confirm that it will be an arrestable offence?

Mr. Hain: That will depend on the exact nature of the legislation that we introduce, but we intend to ensure that it will protect the House in the way that I described.

May I say, perhaps in anticipation of the question that my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) wishes to ask, that when I organised demonstrations it was impossible to bring them alongside the House of Commons because Sessional Orders and the state of the law did not allow that? That has subsequently become possible and hon. Members have not easily been able to get into the House for votes or to make their way through crowds. Additionally, the problem outside on the square itself is continuously with us, so we need an updated response.

John McDonnell: It is best not to anticipate questions. Will the Leader of the House clarify the motion before us? It says that the House

> "approves the proposals set out in paragraphs 9, 10 and 25 of the Report for changes in the practice of the House at the beginning of each Session".

Paragraph 25 of the Procedure Committee report proposes a new Sessional Order including the wording:

> "that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members . . . or to hinder Members by any means in the pursuit of their Parliamentary duties".

When the House reaches a decision on the motion, will we be approving the wording in paragraph 25 as a Sessional Order, or will we still be awaiting the legislation that he proposes to impact on the demonstration?

Mr. Hain: We will be doing both, in a way. We will have to wait for legislation because the Sessional Order does not cover the circumstances that currently affect the House.

Simon Hughes: On the same important issue, can I assume that if we agree to the motion we are not approving paragraph 22 of the Procedure Committee report, which proposes that legislation should be introduced to prohibit long-term demonstrations? Is it the case that nothing that we agree today would prevent the man in the middle of Parliament square from remaining there until legislation that we can properly consider is introduced to determine whether one person, or some or many people, should be allowed to stay in Parliament square?

Mr. Hain: I can confirm that. If the hon. Gentleman reads paragraph 25 on page 11 of the Procedure Committee report, he will note that the situation is clearly explained.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hain: It might better assist the House if I make a bit of progress.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Just for clarity.

Mr. Hain: Well, okay.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The Leader of the House is most kind. I think that I speak for most hon. Members on both sides of the House by saying that the thing that we are most worried about is the defacing of Parliament square that has occurred over the past three years. Will he assure me that any legislation that the Government introduce will apply to what is going on in Parliament square so that the gentleman concerned—after proper notice and following the due process of law—can be removed?

Mr. Hain: The answer to that question is yes, as I shall explain when I manage to reach that point of my speech.

Jeremy Corbyn: I was interested to hear the Leader of the House's response to the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) about the current peace protest in Parliament square. Paragraph 25 sets out the suggested Sessional Order under the wording:

> "the Order should take the following form".

Would that be an invitation to the Metropolitan police to clear the central area of Parliament square at all times, or would the status quo be maintained so that demonstrations in that area would be agreeable with the co-operation of the police? The system of co-operation with the police on demonstrations on the grass part of the square works well.

Mr. Hain: There are all sorts of anomalies. For example, the square is, I believe, owned and controlled by the Greater London authority. My hon. Friend should accept that if those powers existed, then, following pressure from Members of Parliament and requests from the Speaker, the noise would have been dealt with. A change in the law is needed, particularly to deal with the noise.

The Government fully accept that maintaining access to Parliament is essential to its working and to our democracy. We must maintain access; otherwise we cannot do our job as representatives in the cockpit of democracy. The police already use their existing powers, including powers under the Public Order Act 1986, to ensure that access to the House is maintained, and our new power will provide them with an additional tool to do so.

Mr. Salmond: The right hon. Gentleman said, almost regretfully, that when he was organising demonstrations he could not get into Parliament square. Many of us are reluctant to back the proposal, because we have attended business questions and listened to a number of Members who think it hugely important to moan about people demonstrating. There should be powers to prevent Members of Parliament from being obstructed when voting and carrying out their parliamentary duties, but some people, including many members of the Procedure Committee, if we read the evidence, conflate that with a dislike of people exercising their right to free speech and to demonstrate. I hope that hon. Members, whatever their party, believe that sacrificing that right is too a high a price to pay, even though some people think that it is a nuisance.

Mr. Hain: There is a balance to be struck. People must be able to exercise the right to demonstrate and protest, which, as I have stated, is an absolute, traditional and fundamental right in our democratic society. However, as an experienced Member of Parliament, the hon. Gentleman will agree that we must have access to the House. We simply cannot operate on any other basis.

The Committee's report addresses the use of loudhailers by demonstrators in Parliament square. The Government recognise that the use of loudhailers is of particular concern to Members, who have raised it regularly with me, as has Mr. Speaker. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will therefore consider using the order-making power in section 62 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, which governs the use of loudhailers in the streets, to ban the use of loudhailers in the area around Parliament square, subject to exemptions in the case, for example, of emergencies. It is intended to lay the necessary secondary legislation before the House as soon as possible in the new Session. Currently, the use of loudhailers in the streets is prohibited only between 9 pm and 8 am.

Jeremy Corbyn: I thank the Leader of the House for giving way again—he has been very generous with his time. Would the order prevent the use of loudhailers in a permanent demonstration such as the one that is currently taking place, or would it apply to approved rallies, such as those that took place during the Iraq war, in the central part of Parliament square, which is controlled by Westminster council with the co-operation of the police?

Mr. Hain: Speaking from experience, loudhailers and means of making announcements, as my hon. Friend will know, are necessary during demonstrations to marshal people and shepherd them.

Jeremy Corbyn: And for safety reasons.

Mr. Hain: Indeed, they can be used for the orderly progress of a protest. Of course, that will continue to be permitted. However, we are dealing with a persistent "bang, bang, bang", which is deafening for Members in the House who, quite understandably, have complained about it, as have members of press and others who work in the Palace.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): I thank the Leader of the House for giving way yet again. I welcome his announcement while endorsing the comments of the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) that properly policed demonstrations should not suffer as a result. Is the Leader of the House aware that existing legislation such as the Environmental Protection Act 1990, which can usually be used to stop incessant noise, includes an exemption for the purposes of political protest? Would he look at that legislation to see whether we could address the issue by ending the exemption?

Mr. Hain: I am certainly happy to do so, and I am sure that the Home Secretary will do so as we proceed. However, we are trying to address the situation sensitively and ensure that we do not deal with the problem in a heavy-handed way. I believe that the House would expect us to achieve that balance.

Simon Hughes: May I seek two clarifications? In relation to loudspeakers, is the Leader of the House saying that the primary legislation exists, but no secondary legislation has so far been introduced? If legislation is passed, will it be a civil or criminal matter if somebody acts in breach of it?

Mr. Hain: All these matters will be debated in the House when the measure is introduced. As I said, the existing regulations apply between 9 pm and 8 am, and it is the problem that arises outside those times that we need to make progress on.

Mr. Heald: Obviously, there are questions about the area in which the regulations will apply. Many approved demonstrations begin outside Barclays bank and wend their way around Parliament square and up Whitehall. I imagine that that would be perfectly acceptable, but it might help all Members if a draft of the proposed regulations were made available to allow a quick element of consultation before the matter is taken forward.

Mr. Hain: That is an interesting point, and I shall certainly bear it in mind, as will the Home Secretary. We are trying to move by consensus. This is a House matter, and we have been criticised, understandably, for being a bit slow on it. We do not want to rush into things. A lot of care has been taken. [Interruption.] We have not been dragging our heels, as I hear impudently suggested, but taking some care, for precisely the reasons that have been raised in voicing concern that we should strike a balance between the rights of our citizens and voters to express their view to us and maintaining the proper access that we require and our ability to go about our business without the kind of harassment that we have had.

Once new legislation to control demonstrations in Parliament square comes into force, the Procedure Committee considers that the Sessional Order relating to the Metropolitan police will be unnecessary. Meanwhile, the Committee recommends that we continue with the Sessional Order, albeit in an amended form, so as to clarify that it covers the whole parliamentary estate. The motion endorses that proposal. If the House agrees to the motion, at the beginning of the next Session, only that one Sessional Order will be moved—the amended motion on the Metropolitan police.

In conclusion, I believe that the House as a whole will, as I said at the beginning of my speech, be very grateful to the Procedure Committee for its report and its clear exposition of the issues involved. I believe that the changes proposed to our procedures at the beginning of each Session are a sensible reform, and I commend the motion to the House.

4.42 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I welcome the Procedure Committee's report.

Mr. Forth: Do you? Why?

Mr. Heald: Yes, I do, and I offer my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) on his work and that of his Committee. I also pay tribute to the Committee for its output, which has been impressive over the past year.

The motion approves paragraphs 9, 10 and 25 of the report, the effect of which is to change the Sessional Orders by discontinuing some of the old and much-loved usages, such as the passing of orders about elections, witnesses and Votes and Proceedings, although the Outlawries Bill will be kept. The report also suggests that a statement of our rights, duties and responsibilities be recorded, and goes on to suggest a new form of the Sessional Order. Although those may seem modest ideas, I ask why some of these charming old traditions need to be abolished. Only last week, we were abolishing the use of the term "strangers", which never did anyone any harm. I imagine that the new

[Mr. Heald]

Labour battalions are lurking somewhere in the building and that, although they are not debating this matter, they are ready to vote solidly with the Leader of the House if that is required.

Andrew Mackinlay: I am genuinely bewildered about why the hon. Gentleman utters the mantra of the Leader of the House when he refers to the Sessional Orders relating to witnesses as outdated. How is that measure outdated? It is essential. I would love to hear from the hon. Gentleman about that.

Mr. Heald: There is legislation that deals with the issue of witnesses, so I would have thought that the measure was not necessary. I agree with the hon. Gentleman, however, on his earlier comments about the Osmotherly rules. The fact that Lord Hutton can come into an inquiry and have all the witnesses and documents that he wants—[Interruption.] A point about witnesses has been raised, and as the Osmotherly rules are about the conditions under which the Government allow witnesses to attend Select Committees, there is an overlap.

It is wrong that all the documents and witnesses in the world were available and put on the internet when we brought in a judge or a retired civil servant, whereas when the Foreign Affairs Committee asked for the same witnesses and documents, it was told that the matter was top secret and that it could not have the information. I remember the Foreign Affairs Committee report, which was stingingly critical of the Government, on that matter. One criticism of the Leader of the House that I make from time to time is why: on earth has he done nothing about it?

Mr. Hain: I gave evidence to the Liaison Committee on the Osmotherly rules and made proposals, which were widely welcomed, on how we can move forward. I was surprised when the hon. Gentleman referred to the new Labour battalions, because I have never thought that the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), fits that description.

Mr. Heald: That was a cunning wheeze. The Leader of the House appeared before the Liaison Committee—I am sure that it was grateful—but he has yet to find a mechanism by which a Select Committee that asks for a witness or document can speak to the Leader of the House and the Government to explain the importance of the matter and obtain satisfaction.

At business questions the week before last, I suggested that one way in which to tackle the matter would be to form a sub-committee of the Liaison Committee, which could call in the Leader of the House if a dispute occurred. The Leader of the House dismissed the idea out of hand, but I do not know why, because it seems modest enough. If he will not accept my idea, surely as Leader of the House, who is supposed to uphold the rights of Select Committees, strengthen our procedures and support scrutiny, he must introduce a proposal that will work.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): I am a member of the Procedure Committee, but as the Leader of the House well knows, I am not a member of the new Labour battalions. Many Sessional Orders were useless because they referred to proceedings in the St. Stephen's area and stopping people impeding MPs as they struggle through Westminster Hall. People were under the illusion that our contributions were protected, when actually they were not, which is why such matters needed adjustment. The adjustment had nothing to do with modernisation.

Mr. Heald: The access provisions were not underpinned by legislation to enable a police officer to enforce the Sessional Orders, and I am glad that the Leader of the House is introducing proposals on that matter. The main focus of today's debate is the effect of demonstrations in or near Parliament square on the work of the House, particularly the long-standing, visually unattractive demonstration that is accompanied by the extensive use of loudhailers, which disrupt the environment for not only hon. Members, but everyone who works here.

The Procedure Committee put it this way:

> "The Government should introduce appropriate legislation to prohibit long-term demonstrations and to ensure that the laws about access are adequate and enforceable. We also expect the appropriate authorities to explore fully the possibility of using existing legislation to control the use of loud-hailers and other amplification equipment; failing that, the Government should consider legislation on this subject".

The Committee suggested that the mechanism of Sessional Orders is fundamentally insufficient to deal with the current problem, although it recommended that we introduce an interim Sessional Order in the terms set out in paragraph 25, which I support.

I seek assurances on exactly what the Leader of the House intends to do. The Government response stated that a consultation on developing the right police powers for effective and proportionate action would take place, and he has told us today that an offence of not following Sessional Orders will be created. It is important that the police have enough power to change the situation.

Is the right hon. Gentleman able to state whether the offence will be arrestable and whether it will be summary only or either way?

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Should there not be some distinction between an immediate problem of someone preventing an MP from entering the House, which clearly should be an arrestable offence in which the police would be expected to be involved, and a long-term nuisance, which is a civil matter and should be subject to civil remedy, not criminal remedy?

Mr. Heald: I do not agree and I shall explain why.

Mr. Salmond: What did the hon. Gentleman think of Mr. Justice Gray's judgment on 4 October 2002, in which he declined to grant Westminster city council an injunction to prevent the long-term demonstration, citing article 10 of the European convention on human rights? Does the hon. Gentleman think Mr. Justice Gray was wise or unwise to refuse to grant the injunction?

Mr. Heald: As one who served as a barrister for many years, I never criticise the judiciary and I shall not do so on this occasion. The point is that we have a say in article 10 and the operation of the convention, whereas we have not had a say in respect of Parliament square, and I believe that we should. I believe in freedom of expression and of speech—for some years, I spoke at Speakers' Corner as a Hyde Park Tory and I have been on demonstrations. It is important that we are able to conduct our politics, but there are parameters within which one should do so.

Dr. Julian Lewis: May I remind the House that the court case mentioned by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) had nothing to do with the noise nuisance? Noise did not feature in the judgment and was an entirely separate matter. The judgment was based entirely on whether the protester was obstructing members of the public or Members of Parliament.

Mr. Heald: My hon. Friend is correct.

The long-term protester in question is about to embark on a fourth winter as a permanent resident of Parliament green. Although we can admire its durability, his form of protest causes real problems for Parliament and for others. The problem is not aesthetic—it is not just that the posters do not look nice or anything like that. The fact is that he has created something akin to a fence-like structure. That mars the appearance of the square, but the main problem is one of security: to allow a barrier of that sort directly opposite the gates of Parliament is unwise. The Speaker has raised that as a point of concern. Police are forced to check around the barrier on the square several times a day to see what is happening behind the posters and placards, and the fence obscures security sightlines. Today's reality is that we cannot ignore such security concerns, and I think that Mr. Speaker is right to have raised the issue.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that those who are concerned about the barrier in Parliament square could also be concerned about someone sneaking around the statue of Churchill and jumping an unsuspecting Member of Parliament on the way home? The police are present in part to defend our right of free expression under duress, and to say that the gentleman in question presents a security risk is a preposterous argument against his right of expression.

Mr. Heald: Nobody minds someone attending to make a protest carrying a banner—that is part of our democratic process. The point is that that man has set up something like a fence with placards all the way around and the police have to go over there many times a day to check round, because we live in world in which security is tight.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): Will my hon. Friend reflect on the fact that there are enough police in and around the Chamber to match the protesters one for one, and if they have to go out and check behind the fence every now and again, they are probably more usefully employed than they are in here?

Mr. Heald: My hon. Friend has his fun, as he is entitled to. Nevertheless, security around here is important, and it is not right for there to be a permanent barrier that creates cover directly opposite the gates of the Palace and takes up a huge amount of police time and effort. We should not be too amusing about the police presence here, because they do a good job. We need their help, and it is right that we should have it.

Mr. Salmond: I do not know Mr. Justice Gray, but having read his judgment I would strongly advise the hon. Gentleman not to appear before him citing the arguments that he has used in the past few minutes. In effect, the judge said to Westminster city council, "Don't come before me with such rubbish."

Mr. Heald: The hon. Gentleman has clearly not looked into this, because the arguments that were deployed were not based on security considerations.

This is the predominant institution of our democracy and an important symbol of democracy world wide, and it is a terrorist target. Hon. Members may want to have a bit of fun, but these are important matters and we must not ignore them.

Dr. Julian Lewis: In support of my hon. Friend, I remind the House that we have armed police on duty who put their lives on the line every minute of the day—

Mr. Swayne: What, in the Chamber?

Dr. Lewis: I am talking about those on the street. If necessary, they would have to deal with a potentially lethal terrorist attack. How are they expected to make split-second decisions, and to do so wisely, when there is a constant barrage of yammering noise distracting them and putting their safety at risk at a time when it is sufficiently at risk already?

Mr. Heald: My hon. Friend rightly raises the issue of noise. Blaring away into a megaphone is a completely pointless exercise, because nobody can understand a word that is being said, yet it disturbs people all over the Palace and the parliamentary estate. I do not mind somebody wanting to protest in a reasonable way—as I say, I have often spoken at speaker's corner in Hyde park—but the level of noise here is unacceptable, and I welcome the fact that something is going to be done about it.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Before the hon. Gentleman leaves the matter of security entirely, will he clarify whether he opposes, on security grounds, long-term demonstrations by an individual, but is prepared to accept short-term demonstrations involving thousands of people in Parliament square, which, as we know from recent experience, are far more dangerous?

Mr. Heald: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The point about a major, policed demonstration is that it is exactly that—a large demonstration that the police know about in advance and for which they are able to prepare. In the past year, I have been on two such demonstrations—one against the Stansted proposals, and the other in favour of people who have been disadvantaged through the Government's policy on pensions. Proper notice was given, we marched up Whitehall, and the policing was more than adequate.

[Mr. Heald]

The permanent demonstration is different because it is there all the time, it is a fence-like barrier directly opposite the gates of the Palace, it is taking up a lot of police time and effort, and it is a security risk.

John McDonnell: I wish to be clear about the judgment that the hon. Gentleman is making. If the placards were small enough to ensure that a terrorist could not hide behind them and sufficiently aesthetically pleasing to him, would they be acceptable?

Mr. Heald: I have no objection to someone—or a greater number of people— standing outside the House of Commons with a banner and making a point. I simply stress that such activities should be carried out in a proportionate way that does not create a security hazard, and that the noise should not be unreasonable. I fully accept that a loudhailer is needed on a demo but constant, loud wailing is not reasonable.

Mr. Hain: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that, despite all the discussion about the loudhailer, the sole individual and so on, we are also considering some of the problems that we have experienced recently when access to the House has been blocked. The individual whom we have discussed does not pose such a threat but all sorts of demonstrations, including those on hunting and Iraq, have, for the first time in my experience, blocked access to the House. That is the problem and the measures are primarily designed to deal with that.

Mr. Heald: I am grateful to the Leader of the House for making that point; I was sidetracked when I was about to make it. It has always been established that hon. Members should have access to the House to do their job, especially when we are voting, so that democracy can do its work. The measures will underpin that well established principle with the sort of powers that are needed to make it work.

5.1 pm

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I remain unclear about the process that we are going through today. I would welcome any intervention from the Chairman of the Committee to clarify exactly what we are doing. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House told us that consultation will take place to seek a remedy in law to some of the problems that the Committee identified. He said that consultation would take place about the development of a new measure and that an order would be introduced under existing environmental legislation to tackle the supposed nuisance or problem.

Yet we are also being asked to support a motion with a form of words for a new Sessional Order, which tries to provide a remedy for several problems that the Committee identified. The Sessional Order is incredibly wide-ranging. It states:

> "That the Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis do take care that the passages through the streets leading to this House be kept free and open".

We all agree that enabling Members of Parliament to get into the House of Commons to do their duty in voting and participating in debate is critical—no one wants to underestimate the problems that have occurred—but the order goes far beyond that.

The Sessional Order suggests that it is needed to oppose any activities

> "to hinder Members by any means in the pursuit of their Parliamentary duties in the Parliamentary Estate".

The breadth of that is remarkable. It covers any activity that we undertake to hinder hon. Members. I want to hinder some of my hon. Friends in reaching some decisions on specific Bills. I want to do that through argument, lobbying and debate. [Interruption.] The breadth of the order means that an individual—whether or not the placard is small or a terrorist threat exists—cannot stand outside the House.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman may have missed the sedentary intervention from the Front Bench that I heard, implying that what he described did not constitute hindering. However, in the absence of a definition of hindering, what else are we to think? Some hon. Members appear to believe that noise pollution hinders; I do not. I should like to know exactly what hindering means.

John McDonnell: That is the very point that I am making. If hindering is about noise that causes some obstruction to clear thought or work in an office—there are other obstructions to clear thought in the building, but we do not need to go into them now—perhaps we could have a definition of an acceptable decibel level or the problems that some hon. Members experience.

Mr. Heald: It is my understanding that the question of noise is being dealt with separately from the Sessional Order in paragraph 25. Paragraph 25 is about access to the building.

John McDonnell: I have to say that that is not what the Sessional Order says. This order will have to be interpreted by the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, and I think that we are putting him in an impossible position because of the breadth and loose wording of the order, which states that > "no obstruction be permitted . . . to hinder Members by any means in pursuit of their Parliamentary duties in the Parliamentary Estate".

That is a breathtaking range of provision to insist that the commissioner should interpret. Individual constituents, Members or members of staff could insist that the commissioner take action, but against what? Perhaps against a megaphone being used in Parliament square, but at what level? On what frequency? On what days? At what time of day? According to the Sessional Order, the provision would apply when Parliament was in session, but that could be late at night when there was not much going on in the building. This measure would require a subjective judgment on the part of the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, which I think would be inoperable.

Mr. Heald: The particular wording that the hon. Gentleman is criticising has been in the Sessional Orders since time immemorial. The provision used to be enforced by the police, but a change in the law means that that no longer happens. However, this is nothing new; it is very old.

John McDonnell: But now we are trying to use the order against a practice that has been acceptable for a long time. It has certainly been acceptable for the past few years, because Brian Haw has been out there for that long. It has been acceptable behaviour to a large number of us.

I am trying to clarify this question. If the Minister is arguing that we need to consult on new legislation, and that, in regard to some of this supposed nuisance behaviour, we have to introduce a new order that we shall eventually debate, why is that taking place when we are introducing a Sessional Order? Are we pre-empting that consultation? Are we pre-empting the debate on the new order? Why is this necessary? I am completely unclear on this, and I would welcome any intervention that will clarify the matter.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman. As my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) has explained, the provision has been there all along. It has also been ineffective—I see the Minister nodding—which is why the Government have, rightly, to introduce new legislation. The hon. Gentleman is arguing that we should weaken the Sessional Order more than it has been weakened in the past. This proposal is carrying forward something which, though ineffective, has been there all along, with a promise that something effective will be brought in further down the line—and about time, too.

John McDonnell: So we are being asked to approve something that we all agree is totally ineffective, totally useless and therefore unnecessary. What are we doing here? What is the point? Well, we know what the point is. It is that one person out there is exercising his democratic right to free speech. When Ministers introduce legislation, they have to assure us in writing, as part of the process, that it complies with the European convention on human rights. What is remarkable about this order is that we have had no such assurance today in relation to it.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is lamenting the need to interpret the legislation, while at the same time effectively conceding how easy it will be to do so in this particular, rather extreme case. I know the vantage point from which he is perfectly legitimately approaching the subject. We all believe in the right to free speech—I am periodically inclined to exercise it myself—but there is a difference between free speech and a licensed, permanent cacophony of a destructive character.

John McDonnell: That is interesting. In none of the submissions to the Committee that I have seen has there been any mention of "permanent cacophony". It is true that there has been intermittent use of a loudhailer, and I am sure that that has caused some offence to some people, but I think that that is one of the tolerances that we should have in a democracy. With the greatest respect, I find some of the statements that are made in this Chamber offensive, but I accept the democratic right of hon. Members to make them. I also accept the right of Brian Haw to make his statement out there. As soon as we start to undermine that process of free speech, it becomes a slippery slope to intolerance.

Lembit Öpik: Is it not perhaps in order for us to remember as well that we are in a position of relative power in this Chamber? We have the capacity to express our views and occasionally get them reported in the media. A man such as Brian Haw does not have that luxury. It is to his credit that he has caused a debate to take place on account of the fact that he has found an effective means of demonstrating.

John McDonnell: It is a means of demonstration that also shadows what has happened across the world. The Aborigines in Australia and the campaigners in America have all used this tactic to bring something that they feel strongly about to the attention of democratic Parliaments. I welcome Brian Haw. I think he has been a hero for the past few years, suffering throughout those winters to bring to our attention a fundamental issue, which is about peace and opposing war.

On some objections that have been made to Brian Haw, I accept the integrity of a large number of Members who have intervened today to raise their concerns about nuisance and so on, but some interventions and some opposition to what he is doing out there have arisen because some Members do not like to be reminded of what they have done in this Chamber in terms of voting for war and the deaths.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will restrict his remarks to the motion on the Order Paper.

John McDonnell: I will not contradict your ruling, Madam Deputy Speaker, but the point of Brian Haw's protest is to ensure that we listen to him. If we silence him, we will be unable to listen to that message, which is one of peace that opposes some decisions of the House. One of the roles of an MP is to defend the democratic rights of the citizens of this country. That is what we are threatening. This is not to do with noise or nuisance; it is to do with removing the little man's voice from outside the Chamber.

Mr. Hain: I am sure that my hon. Friend would not defend this example—in fact, I know he would criticise it. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking) tried to enter the House during the hunting demonstration and was virtually beaten up. We have to move forward in dealing with such problems. The issue of the loudhailer is one small part of a much wider picture and we really must deal with it. I am sure he agrees with that. I think he should be more proportionate about the points that he is understandably making.

John McDonnell: Is that an allegation that Brian Haw has at any time tried to prevent Members from coming to the House, because he has not, and no one has ever alleged it? We are introducing a Sessional Order and then legislation to obviate one evil—preventing Members from having access to the House—while at the same time wiping out the democratic rights of an individual. The breadth of potential interpretation is what is abhorrent about the Sessional Order. We are also going through a lengthy process of introducing new legislation—a new order to quell the voice of one man who speaks for the majority of the population of this country, against war and for peace.

5.13 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I am always rather uncomfortable when we have a discussion that appears to be ad hominem, so I shall not follow precisely the line pursued by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell), but I want to remind the House that, long before the particular individual whom we have been discussing was permanently installed, a pig named Winston was present. I do not recall any Opposition Member objecting to the presence of that pig, although it was just as untidy as the gentleman to whom we are referring.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Did it have a loudhailer?

Mr. Tyler: It did not, but those who were with it had very loud voices, and rightly so, because they were making an important point on behalf of my constituents, as it happens—those involved in agriculture.

I want to return to the report and the motion. Recommendations 1, 2 and 3, which the Government accept, are very sensible. They should be endorsed by the House. Recommendation 4 relates to the new statement that is to be made giving details of the > "historic claims to privilege including those of freedom of speech and freedom from legal challenge".

That obviously is important, but as my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) said, there surely must be a proposal as to what will be said in that statement. I do not know why we have waited so long, because the report was made to the House in November last year, and we could by now have seen a draft. I hope that we will see one before the general election.

Clearly, however, the main matter for consideration this evening is recommendation 5. I want to read that again to the House:

> "The Government should introduce appropriate legislation to prohibit long-term demonstrations".

That gives rise to all sorts of problems of definition. What is a long-term demonstration? If an individual comes and goes regularly but intermittently, is that a long-term demonstration? If we have a very large demonstration that raises the security issues referred to earlier, and it takes more than 24 hours, is that a long-term demonstration? What is the difference? I am suspicious of that recommendation, and to be fair, so are the Government, whose response states:

> "The Government's first principle is that the right of free expression under Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights should be protected."

Furthermore, they do not ask us to endorse paragraph 22 and recommendation 5. There were concerns in the Committee about the recommendation, as was obvious from the evidence given to it, and as I know from Members present this evening. I therefore hope that we will make progress very slowly on that recommendation. It could be, as hon. Members have said, a slippery slope.

There is something to be welcomed and celebrated about the fact that the main focus of demonstration has in recent months moved from opposite Downing street into Parliament square. I hope that that is recognition that Parliament still has a role in our political society, and that the body politic is not exclusively in Whitehall. It is extremely helpful that people now recognise that speaking to Members of Parliament, albeit occasionally through loudhailers, might have some practical impact. It is much better than simply shouting at No. 10 and assuming that that is the only place in which power lies.

I understand the concerns of members of the public about trying to ensure that their voice is heard. These days, it is difficult. The hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) referred to himself as a member of the Hyde Park Tories—I am not quite sure what that described—but there is a case for a designated area in an appropriate part of London where people can speak their mind and have an audience that is attentive and perhaps even influential. Perhaps he would join me in suggesting that we move speakers' corner from Hyde park to St. James's park—[HON. MEMBERS: "Connaught square."] Hon. Members are suggesting other parts of London, but I am not quite sure why. Perhaps it is opposite the residence of a particular individual.

Mr. Heald: What I heard was Connaught square, which I believe is where the Prime Minister has bought his new house.

Mr. Tyler: I see. I thought it was the hon. Gentleman's house. I thought that he had moved up in the world, too.

There is an extremely important issue at stake. To some extent, the Government are attempting to push it sideways, with references to the Mayor of London's "World Squares for All" proposals for Parliament square. I cannot quite see the Mayor of London addressing the issue in the way that I would prefer, but he may have a different view from the Government's. What is extremely important is that the Government go on to say that there will be a "consultation exercise", but they seek to limit the remit of that consultation exercise to "developing police powers". That must be in the context of the rights of the individual in this country to represent his or her views. The Leader of the House has already said that there is existing legislation to deal with disruptive, dangerous or threatening activities that may concern us in our duties in the House.

Mr. Bercow: I very much admire the hon. Gentleman, but may I put it to him that although the House should have self-respect it should not practise self-delusion? I put it to him that the reason why Mr. Haw continues to indulge in his rancid rants opposite the House of Commons is not that he wishes to pay tribute to Parliament but that he knows that he is able to get off scot-free. That is partly because of the rank naivety of the hon. Gentleman and others.

Mr. Tyler: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. I will defend the right of people who disagree with me to express their views. The hon. Gentleman may well disagree with members of my farming community in Cornwall who express their views in a similar way on a similar site in Parliament square, but I do not recall his objecting.

The House must consider this carefully. If, in the interests of tidiness, we are in any way to undermine the legitimate concerns of our constituents and the public at large—if we are to extinguish long-standing rights—let us do it with our eyes open, and not because we have suddenly joined the Keep Britain Tidy campaign. There is existing legislation to deal with the threats that we all understand are there. I found the flight of fantasy from the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire extraordinary. There are security issues, but they are not there now, and they are not involved in the proposed change to our Sessional Orders.

It is certainly important for us to look carefully at the issue of access, for a number of reasons—access for Members, staff and constituents wishing to come here on legitimate business. The order, however, does not deal with that. I accept that the existing order has been there for some time, but as the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington pointed out, if it has not proved satisfactory in the past why should we repeat it now? The current wording of the revised order is surely redundant. It says:

> "to hinder Members by any means in the pursuit of their Parliamentary duties in the Parliamentary Estate".

That section does not deal with those who are trying to get into the parliamentary estate. The revised order seems to ignore the whole question of access.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman with some impatience. It seems to me that he has not read the report in full, and has not taken note of the fact that we received representations and evidence from the Metropolitan Police Commissioner himself, the Serjeant at Arms, the Clerk of the House and others associated with the security and administration of the parliamentary estate. Does he give no weight to the evidence and views of those who have looked after this place for hundreds of years?

Mr. Tyler: I am a great fan of the hon. Gentleman and of the traditions of the House, but I have read the evidence in the report, and it is far from clear that there is unanimity. I wish there were, because that would make it much easier for us. I also have great respect for the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, but let us face it: the police made some absurd mistakes on the day of the hunting demonstration. It was their fault that people came into this place disguised as building workers; it was no fault of officers of the House. I take with a pinch of salt the suggestion in the evidence that the commissioner is seeking new powers. Whenever the police seek new powers, I think it the right and responsibility of Members to establish why the existing powers are not sufficient.

Mr. Heald: Much has been made of the permanent demonstration. The commissioner spoke of what happened four years ago when there was a demonstration, Parliament square was cut up and statues were damaged. He said that there should be stronger powers to tackle such dangerous incidents. I do not think we should spend the entire debate speaking about Mr. Haw.

Mr. Tyler: I entirely agree, which is why I want to return to recommendation 7. It is clear from the recommendation—I understand that the Government accept this—that the legislation they are now considering, in a wider sense, will require extensive consultation, for reasons that I think all hon. Members would appreciate. The new Sessional Order is essentially an interim measure, and a very insubstantial and probably rather ineffective one.

What happens next? I am always slightly suspicious of secondary legislation, and the suggestion that everything will be straightforward—that it is just a matter of detail, and that the wish of the House is being implemented. It is easy for us to agree to that. The Leader of the House said earlier that this would be a matter for secondary legislation. I hope that there will be the fullest possible consultation, and that we will have a full opportunity to examine the implications of that secondary legislation. All too often, such legislation goes through with insufficient scrutiny. That is a major criticism of our parliamentary procedure, and this particular issue surely requires very careful scrutiny indeed.

Yes, we need to strike a balance. In considering access to this place, we have to ensure that Members, their staff and constituents, and the staff of the House are protected. That is critical, and we cannot afford to allow undue pressure to be applied that prevents us from doing our duty, but equally, in terms of freedom speech, one of our duties is to ensure that members of the public are not impeded if they want to exercise their right and duty to express their views in a democratic society. The balance between those two conflicting pressures is a very difficult one to strike, and it requires that all Members of the House—not just somebody Upstairs in Committee—consider them very carefully.

I hope that in responding to this debate the Minister will make it clear that this matter will be given careful consideration, so that we do not end up with a very unbalanced situation.

5.25 pm

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): I will not detain the House for long, but there are just a couple of observations that I would like to make. First, we should dissociate the question of access to the House from what is currently going on in Parliament square, inasmuch as we can. Unlike the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), I consider the Procedure Committee's proposal—I am a member of that Committee—to be effective. It orders that

> "no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House", and subsequently refers to the duties that we carry on in the House. Such duties are the very reason why we are trying to ensure that Members are not so obstructed, so the proposal makes eminent sense.

In my view, the police need this reminder. On both of the two occasions on which I was prevented from entering the House, the police were responsible. When George W. Bush was in the area—I understand that he has been re-elected President of the United States—I and other MPs were prevented from getting anywhere near the House of Commons for some considerable time. [Interruption.] I note that other Members did indeed experience such a problem. Whatever the commissioner understood about his responsibility to ensure that Members of Parliament could actually get here to perform their duties, that message somehow failed to percolate down to officers controlling the area. They treated Members of Parliament as if they were members of the public, who could be directed as and when they wished.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman is making a very interesting point. If the Government proceed with criminal legislation, who might be prosecuted if such circumstances are repeated? Would he like to venture an answer?

Mr. McWalter: I am tempted to say that if members of the police force do not carry out their duties, they would be subject to the normal process of police discipline for failing to understand and act on their responsibilities. I rather doubt whether the laws that we get will push things any further than that, but Members will also know that historically, this Chamber has been ringed with policemen to prevent Members from entering. I know that we are talking about the 17th century, but that is how Cromwell succeeded in getting complete control of the parliamentary process.

So there is an historical precedent to show that, if one wants to turn democracy into tyranny, the first thing to do is to ensure that Members of Parliament cannot sit on these Benches and discuss matters in the way that we are currently doing. The House needs to be very mindful of that pivotal right. It is a pivotal right not only for Members of Parliament, but for the 56 million people whom we represent when we come here. We are the custodians of their freedoms, and our freedom is a condition of that. So this is not a trivial matter, and we need to ensure that that right is properly protected.

The second issue that I wish to raise relates to the suggestion that all MPs should wear an identity card for security purposes. I would like to make a couple of points about that. On the other occasion when I was stopped from entering the House, the officer on the door did not just ask whether I was an MP—I said yes—but also whether I had my identity card. I scrambled around in my pockets but was unable to find it. I was detained nearly beyond the end of a vote, but just about managed to get in at the very last minute.

If it became a condition for entry to the Palace that one had to have a pass, it would pose many interesting issues. First, Members could forget their pass; it could be lost or stolen. In many ways, the requirement to use a pass could prove a significant obstacle to Members carrying out their duties. I heard one Member say last week, "MPs want to be privileged, being the only people who do not have to wear a pass", but the answer to that is that as few obstacles as possible should be put in the way of MPs who come here to participate in debates. Any requirement to wear a pass could certainly compromise that freedom.

Demonstrations in Parliament square are a separate issue. I have already provided my own example to show that Members are sometimes prevented from entering the Palace. Not having a clear understanding of the rights of people in Parliament square is another important component of the problem. We need to sort out whether people can have a permanent encampment and whether hundreds of thousands of people can be allowed there. We need to make clear exactly what rights people have. I insist that that be factored in, of course, with the rights of Members of Parliament to unhindered passage to this place in order to perform their duties in the House. That is the most important matter. It is vital to have facilities for demonstrations and perhaps we should look into their longevity, intermittence and similar issues. Crucially, the right of MPs to get into the House is a fundamental part of our democracy, so I hope that Members will accept the recommendations of the Procedure Committee.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I am very pleased to follow the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter), who is a hardworking member of the Procedure Committee, bringing independence and objectivity to the views that he expresses in considering the matters on which we take evidence and produce reports.

I am grateful for the opportunity to support the Government motion and to speak about the Procedure Committee's report. Perhaps you will allow me, Madam Deputy Speaker, to say that the structure of these debates puts the Committee's Chairman in some difficulty. Many Front Benchers and a number of Back Benchers have spoken, and it is wrong that the Chairman is not allowed to express the views of the Procedure Committee to the House before others get up to criticise it.

Let me respond immediately to the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell). In no way are we seeking to end demonstrations in Parliament square. In no way are we seeking to deny people the right of free speech or the right to make their views clear and well known to Members of Parliament. What we are seeking to do is to use Parliament square in a far better fashion. I believe that Mr. Haw has been there for some considerable time—at least three years. We believe that that is rather long for one demonstrator to do what he is doing there. In being there, he may well be deterring other groups or other individuals from exercising their right of free speech, and they might do it in a rather better way than Mr. Haw.

John McDonnell: Did the Committee receive any evidence from other groups to the effect that Mr. Haw had prevented them from demonstrating in Parliament square?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: We received evidence from Members of Parliament, including the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn)—he is sitting next to the hon. Gentleman this afternoon—because we wanted to take evidence from everyone who had a view on this matter. That included people who were strongly opposed to the demonstrations in Parliament square, people who were rather equivocal about demonstrations, and people like the hon. Member for Islington, North, who were positively in favour of people being able to demonstrate.

John McDonnell: My question is, did anyone suggest in evidence that Mr. Haw was preventing others from demonstrating in the square? That is not recorded in any of the minutes.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: That view was expressed, although it may not have been minuted in the report. The view was put forward that Mr. Haw could be preventing other individuals or groups from demonstrating who wished to do so. I believe that the hon. Gentleman would not be unsympathetic to other groups using the square for that purpose, or to Mr. Haw returning at some stage in the future.

Lembit Öpik: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: No, as I want to be logical and constructive about this matter. I say to the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington that, if a man cannot make his point and get his view across in three years, he will not do it in 30 years. Parliament square should be the place where other people can register their views. The Procedure Committee heeded the advice of those from whom we took evidence. They included the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, the Clerk of the House and the Serjeant at Arms. We also received the encouragement of Mr. Speaker, who is deeply concerned about the situation in Parliament square. Our aim is not to deny free speech or people's right to demonstrate, but to ensure that those activities are conducted in a more regulated and appropriate way.

Jeremy Corbyn: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way and for allowing me to present evidence to his Committee when it investigated this matter. Numerous other demonstrations have taken place while Brian Haw has been in the square. On one slightly bizarre occasion, I was talking to him when he decided he wanted a photograph of him in conversation with some peace protesters visiting from Canada. He went off and got one of the hunt supporters to take the photograph. The two sides seemed to have worked out a modus operandi, even though I suspect that they probably did not agree on anything.

Mr. Bercow: That is a case of exceptional charity.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I do not know about that. On most occasions, I very strongly disagree with the views expressed by the hon. Gentleman. However, I have the highest regard for him, as he is brave in his advocacy of free speech and of the issues that he feels are of paramount importance to this country and deserving of being raised in Parliament. In no way am I hostile to the hon. Gentleman: I want the situation in Parliament square to be regulated.

Mr. Salmond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Of course I shall give way to my very good friend from north of Hadrian's wall.

Mr. Salmond: That will not help. I yield to no one in my admiration of the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, as he knows. That is why so many of us are so disappointed that he should suggest Mr. Haw's failure to put across his point in three years as the reason for introducing measures that, at least at first sight, appear somewhat draconian. It is our disappointment that the hon. Gentleman's usual strong defence of free speech is not represented in the report that is causing us to make these interventions.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I think that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the report. In no way are we trying to deny free speech: quite the opposite. In many ways, we are trying to give more people the opportunity of free speech in Parliament square.

Lembit Öpik rose—

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I shall give way later on, but I should like to develop my argument as Chairman of the Committee.

I am grateful that the motion implements nearly all the Committee's recommendations, although I shall have something briefly to say about Parliament square a little later on. Let us go back into the history of these matters. As hon. Members will be aware, at the beginning of each Session we hear the Queen's Speech in the morning and we return in the afternoon to debate it, but before the debate begins the House is asked to agree six questions. Because it is the first day of the Session no notice can be given of the questions, so Mr. Speaker reads them in full to the House. They are the Sessional Orders and resolutions; the current ones are set out on page 3 of the Procedure Committee's report. They relate to elections, witnesses, the Metropolitan police and the Votes and Proceedings.

As we note in our report, it was Mr. Speaker—I highlight that point—who encouraged us to look at those orders and resolutions to consider whether they should be abolished or updated. As Members will see, we recommended, with only one exception, that they should be abolished. That was not an easy decision for me to take—I say that especially to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth)—because I am a great traditionalist and I like some of the older features of the way the House operates, but we cannot stand against change when change is inevitable.

The one exception was the order instructing the Metropolitan Police Commissioner to prevent access to the House from being impeded. That order took up most of the Committee's time and I shall return to it after dealing with the other five—

Mr. Forth rose—

Sir Nicholas Winterton: But first I give way without hesitation to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my modernising Friend. To help the House, will he elaborate on the phrase he has just used, "when change is inevitable"? I would have thought that the whole point of our deliberations was to decide whether change was desirable and not for us to proceed on the basis of some odd inevitability.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I have great regard and respect for Mr. Speaker, so perhaps when I said that change was inevitable I should have added that it should also be justified.

[Sir Nicholas Winterton]

I repeat that Mr. Speaker was concerned, and if, on behalf of the House, Mr. Speaker requests us to investigate a matter, we are obliged to do so. We took wide evidence, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst will see, and came to the conclusion that most of the orders were no longer relevant.

Mr. Heald: The hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) made a point about tampering with witnesses. Does my hon. Friend agree that the House has the power to deal with that, but it was rather inappropriate to put that matter alongside one that we had no power to deal with? Does he agree that the powers to deal with witnesses still exist and that there is no question of their going?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: If my hon. Friend will be patient, I intend to come on to that matter.

Mr. Bercow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I cannot refuse my hon. Friend.

Mr. Bercow: On the Conservative Benches, following the dictum of Edmund Burke, we have always accepted that the state which lacks the means of change lacks the means of its own conservation. May I further encourage my senior hon. Friend not to be subjected to parliamentary bullying by our right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth)? In the earlier debate, when I chided my right hon. Friend for being opposed to all change since the 11th century, he corrected me by saying that he had in fact been opposed to all change since the fourth.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am a very good friend of the hon. Member for Buckingham, so I am delighted that he has, on this occasion, come so robustly to my defence.

All the current Sessional Orders and resolutions date back to at least 1713, and many of them are even older than that. However, I say to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst that they have not been considered unalterable. Several were converted into Standing Orders in 1852 and others, such as those about peers not voting in parliamentary elections and the printing of the Journal, were discontinued quite recently, in 2000. Various other minor changes have been made to them over the years.

The Procedure Committee—again, I highlight this—took detailed evidence from the Clerk of the House, a learned gentleman who serves the House well, and from the Serjeant at Arms. We discovered that the orders about elections, witnesses and the votes and proceedings could all be dispensed with. That was their advice to the Committee. Some were unnecessary, some were obsolete and at least one was misleading. I refer to the order that says that against those engaging in corrupt practices at elections. I am not for a moment suggesting that corrupt practices do not matter, but simply that the House has not been able to proceed against them since 1868, when jurisdiction on such matters was transferred to the courts.

"this House will proceed with the utmost severity"

Why do we proceed with reading out long Sessional Orders that are obsolete? The provisions for double returns are no longer necessary. They applied when there was a tie and the returning officer returned two names for a constituency instead of one. Now, in the event of a tie, the choice is made by lot. Why is that Sessional Order required? It is no longer needed; it is obsolete.

One other provision is probably obsolete, but it could theoretically still be needed. This is the one about a Member being returned for more than constituency. I am not sure whether the House knows when this last occurred, but it last happened in 1910. In case it happens again, the relevant part of the Sessional Order about elections is reproduced at the end of the day's motion to make it permanent.

Among the unnecessary motions are those about witnesses. In recommending the abolition of those motions, we are not ascribing any less importance to the principles that witnesses should not give false evidence or be tampered with. I see the Committee's chairman, my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), behind me, and hon. Members will surely recall that a case was referred to the Standards and Privileges Committee this Session

Mr. Heald: The case of the Lord Chancellor.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Indeed. However, we do not need to say something about such cases every year. That is now part of the longstanding practice of the House.

Andrew Mackinlay rose—

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I give way to another Government Member for whom I have enormous admiration.

Andrew Mackinlay: Likewise, but the hon. Gentleman's admiration may be against his better judgment. However, does he realise that the Sessional Orders are the only thing that we have to caution witnesses and those people who would lean on witnesses? The orders afford some protection to those who might be leant on. The fact that they have not been drawn to anyone's attention is the real problem.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: The hon. Gentleman has made his point to the House and I am sure that it will be noted by the Deputy Leader of the House and the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint). As we say at paragraph 10 of our report, the survival of the Sessional Orders for so long may reflect a desire by the House to begin the Session with a reminder of matters that it considers important. Certainly the issue to which the hon. Gentleman has just drawn attention is important.

As I hope I have made clear, we believe that the Sessional Orders are no longer appropriate for that purpose, but we have suggested that, instead, Mr. Speaker might make a statement about the duties and responsibilities of Members. I believe that that will be very useful to the House, and the House, my Committee and Mr. Speaker will clearly turn their attention to it.

We also recommend the continuation of the First Reading of the Outlawries Bill. That takes only a few seconds and serves to remind the House of an important principle. Once Parliament has been opened, it does not have to begin a Session by considering the Queen's Speech. It can, if it wishes, consider other business.

I return to the Sessional Order that has dominated the debate: that on access to the House. I tell the hon. Members for Hayes and Harlington and for Islington, North that the order, like the others, is nearly 300 years old, so it is much older than the Metropolitan police to whom it is now addressed. As hon. Members will note, it includes a provision to prevent disorder in Westminster Hall, but we think that that has become unnecessary because Westminster Hall is now within the parliamentary estate and the precincts of the House.

At the beginning of the 19th century, the order also provided that there should be no annoyance by chairmen. Quite by chance, I have an interesting extract from the Journal of the House from the year of 1801, and I hope that hon. Members will not mind if I read it out. It says:

> "Ordered, That the Constables in Waiting do take Care that there be no Gaming, or other Disorders, in Westminster Hall, or the Passages leading to the House, during the Sitting of Parliament; and that there be no Annoyance by Chairmen, Footmen, or otherwise, therein or thereabouts."

Of course, those chairmen were not Chairmen of Committees, but those who would be at either end of a sedan chair. I thus do not take the matter, which was drawn to my attention by the Clerk of the Procedure Committee, too personally, although having recently injured my Achilles' tendon, I could do with the use of a number of chairmen and a sedan chair to get around the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Salmond: This is all rollicking good stuff, as we expect from the hon. Gentleman. Will he tell us where the specific phrase in paragraph 25 of the report that says is currently contained in the existing Sessional Order, printed on page 3 of the report?

> "or to hinder Members by any means in the pursuit of their Parliamentary duties"

Sir Nicholas Winterton: May I come back to that, even if I perhaps do so after I have finished my speech, because I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a direct answer off the cuff? I know that he would not want me to give him false information, because he and I have an understanding that we are always direct with each other.

Although the existing Order has a quaint aspect, it has a serious side, too. I am sure that most hon. Members agree that access to the House should be preserved at all times so that its work may go on uninterrupted. I suspect that hon. Members believe that the Order gives the Metropolitan police extra powers to ensure that that occurs, but unfortunately that is not the case. No Order of the House—neither the current one nor any revised one—can give the police extra powers, which to an extent addresses a concern raised earlier by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington. Powers relating to London exist in the Metropolitan Police Act 1839, but they are largely unenforceable.

Measures to prevent large numbers of people from approaching the House for specific purposes were repealed in 1986. I know that because on at least two occasions I took part in demonstrations in support of textile workers and those in this country's textile and clothing industries—they still have my support. We were allowed to march from Hyde park, but the closest we could come to the Palace of Westminster was the Tate gallery, because we were governed by the legislation that existed prior to 1986. The law on demonstrations that block access to Parliament is in practice exactly the same as the one applying to demonstrations elsewhere in the country.

I repeat and emphasise the point that we are not calling for a ban on demonstrations. As we say in paragraph 11 of the report:

> "the right to demonstrate peacefully is highly prized and is a fundamental right, and we have no desire to prevent the public expressing their concerns to Members of Parliament in this way."

John McDonnell: Further to the intervention by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), the words to be inserted in the new Sessional Order do not exist in the old one, and greatly expand the advice that we are giving the Metropolitan Police Commissioner. The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) is arguing that he simply wants to regulate demonstrations, but he has not given us any information about how that is to be done. Will they be licensed, and will the licence have to be paid for? Is he going to set up a regulator called Ofdemo?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I fear that those questions should be put not to me but to the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Don Valley, and the Government. We have highlighted a problem that requires attention. However, I am grateful for much of what the Leader of the House said.

Lembit Öpik: Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that with the best will in the world his proposals will almost certainly have the unintended consequence of restricting demonstrations? For example, he thought that Mr. Haw could be prevented from demonstrating in Parliament square, but there could be a continuous demonstration on a rotating basis. He cannot have it both ways—he must accept either that there is a continuous demonstration by different people or that demonstration is limited.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Personally, I believe that there could be many demonstrations, but longstanding demonstrations by individuals should be regulated and come to an end. If other people want to come and demonstrate in their place, they can do so. However, more stringent regulations are needed because of the environmental and heritage importance of Parliament square.

Mr. Heald: The original text includes the words

> "that there be no annoyance therein or thereabouts".

John McDonnell: That applies to Westminster Hall.

Mr. Heald: No, it applies to a much a wider area and covers all the environs of Parliament. The new wording is as follows:

"to hinder Members by any means in the pursuit of their Parliamentary duties".

If anything, that is a narrower definition.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Following the quote that I read out a moment ago, I should highlight the fact that that is not the same as preventing access to Parliament. Demonstrations should not prevent hon. Members from reaching the House, as the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter), a member of the Procedure Committee, said. The police tell us that they need powers to ensure uninterrupted access. Although the order deals with access, we also considered the related matter of the nuisance caused by demonstrations in Parliament square—both the unsightly nature of long-term demonstrations in a world heritage site and, perhaps more importantly, the noise from megaphones and amplifiers, which prevent people in nearby offices from doing their work properly. I have seen evidence that members of the public are grossly inconvenienced by the raucous noise emanating from those megaphones.

Dr. Julian Lewis: My hon. Friend neatly anticipates my concern about noise. Can he confirm that, whatever demonstrations are allowed, whether they are individual, long-term, short-term or, indeed, rotating, it is important that they should not cause annoyance by bombarding people doing legitimate work with incessant sound? Does he also accept that while loudhailers are, as the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) rightly pointed out, essential to communicate with people participating in a set-piece demonstration, it is an abuse to use them continually to interfere with people who are not part of the demonstration?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend anticipates what I am about to say. The Committee simply could not understand why the noise is allowed to go on, day after day, given all the recent legislation on noisy neighbours. Attempting to prevent long-term demonstrations may be controversial—and hon. Members have expressed such a concern—but we think that that should be done while allowing short-term demonstrations, provided that they do not impede access or produce unreasonable amounts of noise.

Mr. Salmond: We are now coming to the nub of the issue. What I would like to know is where the phrase comes from. Did it come from the Committee Clerk, or was it a joint production of the Committee? Was the Committee influenced by the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), who is so worried and concerned about noise pollution? Where did the phrase come from and what does it mean?

"or hinder Members by any means"

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I can only say that it was the wording chosen by the Committee as a whole, with the advice of our Clerk, and as Chairman, I therefore take full responsibility for it. I say those words with Ministers present on the Treasury Bench.

The Government undertook at paragraph 7 of their reply to the report to consult on ensuring that the police have power to act—again, I address my remarks to the hon. Members for Hayes and Harlington and for Islington, North—"effectively and proportionately" in relation to activities near Parliament. That consultation took place as part of a wider Home Office consultation on modernising police powers. We know that, and I accept that process, which closed recently, on 8 October.

Mr. McWalter: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is about to emphasise that many of the orders relate to Parliament proceeding with severity, although he is now making the completely accurate point that these duties have to be reposited in the police. In the 1840s, Parliament imprisoned an Irish Member for failing to sign up to a Committee on the basis that his not doing so destroyed the work of the Committee. He was imprisoned here for a week by Members of Parliament, but those days are gone, and we have to have a new agency dealing with these matters.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that Parliament should once again assume those powers and authorities. I fear that, on both sides of the House, there would be a number of people whom we would like to see locked away.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Would not imposing in the 21st century the punishment of being confined to the Chamber with some speakers whom we could name be categorised in Europe and elsewhere as a cruel and unnatural punishment?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I assume that the hon. Gentleman is not referring to the person who currently has Mr. Deputy Speaker's permission to speak. I know the hon. Gentleman well and I know that he is not doing that, but I would be inclined to agree with him.

I am grateful to the Government for what they have said today in respect of taking action both about demonstrations, and perhaps the unsightly nature of some of them, and about the raucous noise, which disturbs not only tourists and other members of the public in and around Parliament square, but Members of the House, staff of the House and those who work in the proximity of the square.

I make my next point just as the Leader of the House is leaving—he has returned; I did not know I had that influence. To follow up the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire, I ask the Government to look at this matter urgently, seek to introduce orders or legislation taking account of the views that have been expressed by those who are concerned that we are not trying to limit demonstrations, and to ensure that action is taken as urgently as possible, not only to enhance Parliament square and to ensure that demonstrations are more regulated in future, but also to act in a modest way in respect of security. This House is spending very large sums on security, and we should not ignore that.

In the meantime, although I accept that what has been said so far could perhaps be implemented sooner—some people might say that it is second best—the Committee recommended that the Sessional Order on access should continue in a modified and updated form until new legislation comes into force, which is a point the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan and others have raised in the course of this debate. The Committee left out references to Westminster Hall, but we included not only the Palace itself, but the whole parliamentary estate.

I hope that I have answered most of the concerns. If the point raised by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan has not been fully dealt with, on hearing from him, I will seek to provide him with further information. I commend the report to the House and hope that the legislation, which we called for and which the Government have promised, will be introduced at an early date for Parliament's consideration.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): On a point of order—I apologise to hon. Members who want to continue the debate, which is on an important subject—earlier today, an important exchange occurred between my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) and the Leader of the House on resources for Members of Parliament in connection with IT provision for remote users. That problem is being made worse by the amount of spam that we receive. I seek your assistance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because one particular company, Argos, is bombarding us with commercial material in a perfectly legitimate attempt to sell things, but it has not responded to requests to remove Parliament from its database, which causes the problem raised by my hon. Friend. Will you bring that matter to the attention of the relevant authorities and see what can be done not only to stop that nonsense, but to release resources that would help us to serve our constituents?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I cannot make a ruling on that matter from the Chair, but the hon. Gentleman's points are on the record and will be noted by the appropriate department of the House.

6.7 pm

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I regret the fact that the Order Paper invites us to deal with all the changes to the Sessional Orders in one vote rather than deal with them separately. I have listened to the important points about Parliament square with considerable interest, and my view has moved backwards and forwards as the debate has gone on.

I urge hon. Members to join me in the Lobby tonight to resist the changes, because the overriding point is the removal of the Sessional Orders relating to witnesses, which have been around since the 1700s and have their genesis in the Bill of Rights. What fools we would be if, late one Wednesday evening, we swept away something that is essential to our parliamentary democracy. We are being invited to do that tonight, and it is foolhardy in the extreme.

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): I respect the strength with which my hon. Friend speaks, but I refer him to evidence 4 in the Procedure Committee report, which gives the reason why those Sessional Orders are obsolete—namely, the definition of parliamentary contempt in "Erskine May". I suggest to my hon. Friend that the protection that he seeks exists elsewhere.

Andrew Mackinlay: Even if I am wrong—I do not think so—it is incumbent on those seeking a change to advance an alternative, which they have failed to do, to ensure that evidence given to Parliament is the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth and that people do not interfere with witnesses. We should not support any change until we know the alternative.

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and admire his stance. The Deputy Leader of the House's response that the protection exists elsewhere is not sufficient, and surely that protection should be strengthened rather than weakened. There would be no harm in reasserting that protection at the beginning of every Session, because a civil servant coming before this House needs reassurance that their career will not be wrecked if they speak the truth.

Andrew Mackinlay: The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. The great problem is not that the Sessional Orders are irrelevant and out of date, but that there has been a lack of vigour and will on the part of Parliament to ensure that people coming before a Committee are clearly cautioned beforehand that they are expected to be candid with Parliament.

Mr. McWalter: My hon. Friend's integrity, determination and courage are on the record, but surely he understands that to pretend that the House has the capacity to proceed with severity against those who infringe our Sessional Orders is a major mistake. We need to do what he wants us to do properly, not to pretend that some 1839 law has sorted everything out for us.

Andrew Mackinlay: I disagree. The fact is that we have the power; what is needed is enforcement. Most legislatures have such powers and enforce them. On this occasion, I commend the Congress of the United States, which requires those giving evidence to take the oath. Parliament would be sensible to follow suit. We all know that taking the oath before entering the witness box cautions us about the gravity of the evidence that we are about to give. It would help if we did the same in Parliament—it is provided for in Standing Orders.

My point is that we do not caution anyone and it has become the custom or culture for someone appearing before a Select Committee to regard it as legitimate sport to give as little away as possible. Doing so is not seen as being irregular, nor does it attract any criticism of any substance when one is found out. Severe penalties ought to be enforced if a person perjures himself before a parliamentary Committee.

Jeremy Corbyn: I understand my hon. Friend's comments about the gravity of giving evidence to Select Committees, but I was a member of a Select Committee that attempted to interview the Maxwell brothers about missing pension funds: they said that they were not prepared to answer any questions and prayed in aid the right of silence, which is inherent in law in this country. What would he do about such a case?

Andrew Mackinlay: In my view, there should have been sanctions for declining to respond to Parliament. About a year ago, I was criticised for saying,

> "This is the high court of Parliament", but that is precisely what it is, and we should not forget that.

It has been suggested that the Sessional Orders that the Speaker reads out at every state opening of Parliament are long. They are not. I am particularly interested in the one that states:

> "if it shall appear that any person has been tampering with any witness, in respect of his evidence to be given to this House, or any Committee thereof, or directly or indirectly has endeavoured to deter or hinder any person from appearing or giving evidence, the same is declared to be a high crime and misdemeanour; and this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender."

We have to do that if we are to be taken seriously as a Parliament.

Let me draw on personal experience of what I regard as attempts to interfere with Select Committees. When I was a member of a Select Committee in a past Parliament, the permanent secretary of a Government Department intimated to the Committee that the witness we wanted—a junior civil servant, or junior to him at least—was sick. I found it somewhat surprising to hear that on the Monday because I had seen the man in question on Saturday partying. After I had let that be known, that civil servant, to his eternal credit, stormed up to the permanent secretary and said, "What is this you're saying about me? I insist that I appear." He did so and acquitted himself well, and two weeks later got substantial promotion.

That is an example of deliberate interference by a senior civil servant to frustrate the attempts of a Select Committee to get a witness to appear. To complete the picture, let me tell the House that a senior Minister phoned me at midnight one Sunday to ask, "What the hell were you doing?"—he used those words, or perhaps stronger ones. He concluded by saying, "This conversation never took place." Well, it did, and the whole affair is recorded in my diary. The fact is that attempts have been made to interfere with Select Committees and we need to stamp on them to ensure that they are never repeated.

These Sessional Orders are very important because they protect those people in the public or the private sector who recognise their public responsibilities and want to be candid to Parliament but are being leaned on by employers, managers or some other vested group. I should have liked the Committee to say that before a witness appears before a Select Committee, its Chairman should draw his or her attention, probably when they receive the invitation to appear, to the fact that they are obliged to be completely candid and to give full disclosure, and help him or her by saying that if anybody should interfere with that it will be taken very seriously by Parliament. We do not do that—why not?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I can tell the hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) that the Liaison Committee is considering that matter. If the hon. Gentleman would like the Procedure Committee to be involved, he might care to write to me, and I will ensure that we, too, consider it.

Andrew Mackinlay: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I do not want to delay the House for much longer because I should like to hear from the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire, whom I hold in the highest regard. However, if what the hon. Gentleman says is correct, why are we making this change? It is foolish and should be rejected. The Leader of the House mentioned his submission on the Osmotherly rules. We know that no Government—not only Labour Governments, but Tory Governments hitherto—like civil servants to appear before Select Committees, so they pray in aid the Osmotherly rules, which, to his credit, the Clerk of the House of Commons, in his memorandum to the Hutton inquiry, said are not agreed or subscribed to by Parliament. That is on the public record, and rightly so.

The Osmotherly rules are conjured up by the Executive of the day to protect and promote their selfish interests. It is time that we asserted ourselves to say that we will have nothing to do with that, and that we will introduce a discipline whereby people who appear before Select Committees are protected, but expected to give full disclosure and candour. That is why right hon. and hon. Members, including those who are in the Tea Room, should join me in the Lobby later this evening to sink this stupid proposal.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I am grateful for the trailer given by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay). Whether he spoke loudly enough for his voice to carry to the Tea Room remains to be seen. I want to make three points, the first of which is a direct response to the hon. Member for Thurrock.

The hon. Gentleman may know that relatively recently the Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs reported to the Committee on Standards and Privileges a potential case of breach of privilege in which a witness who had given evidence felt that she had been disadvantaged by having been threatened with removal. When we investigated the matter, we found that there had indeed been contempt. The Government are reviewing the rules following our discovery that the civil service is not well informed about Select Committees, privilege and the risk of contempt. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) and I, together with other members of the Liaison Committee, are providing input to clarify the rights and privileges of Select Committees and the risks that are run if there is any contempt or tampering with witnesses.

My second point relates to the Sessional Orders. The Procedure Committee recommended the replacement of obsolete Sessional Orders and resolutions with a statement of the duties and responsibilities of Members, with the details being left to the discretion of the Speaker. In their response, the Government accepted that recommendation and suggested that the Committee on Standards and Privileges might wish to express a view on a form of words. My Committee was sympathetic to the idea of making a contribution, so with Mr. Speaker's approval we offered him some thoughts reflecting the substance of the Procedure Committee's vision, which, when he draws up the statement that he will make to the House at the start of the Session—if the motion is agreed—he may wish to bear in mind.

My third point concerns Parliament square, which is an issue that I have pursued in business questions and in Westminster Hall. I was pleased to hear what the Leader of the House said when he introduced the debate. However, we have waited two days short of a year for the Government to come up with that response, and we still do not know when the legislation that he mentioned will be introduced or enacted.

In the meantime, the problem will continue. I was slightly dispirited by the remarks of the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), who appeared to advocate a slow process. I have no objection to draft legislation and consulting the House, but I hope that there will be no further delay. The problem has existed for three years. The Procedure Committee has made inquiries and reported and the Government have consulted extensively within government for a year. I hope that there will be no undue delay in making progress.

I have always advocated a balanced solution that respects the rights of the individual to protest, those of visitors to the centre of our great capital to appreciate and enjoy one of the most historic sites in the world and those of people who work nearby, not least the policemen on duty at the gates, to work without constant high volume noise. The solution should also respect the rights of those who work in or visit the Palace not to have our security compromised by providing cover at the entrance to New Palace Yard. My strong view is that we have not got the balance right.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): I agree with my right hon. Friend. Does he agree that, if workers in any other place in the country were subjected to the same noise and interference as those whose job it is to protect us suffer from the cacophony on the other side of road, all the health and safety legislation in the land would be brought to bear on them? The police officers have to put up with an intolerable burden.

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend makes a valid point, which leads to my next comment. We are not considering deprivation of a long established right or a threat to freedom of expression. We are trying to close a loophole in the law to get back to where we believed we were three or four years ago. Brian Haw has discovered the loophole and, well advised by Messrs Bindmans, exploited it. If we were starting from scratch, would we introduce a law to ban such activity from every pavement in London but specifically allow it outside the entrance to the House of Commons? We would not, but the law currently provides for that and the House would be well advised to move to a more defensible position that removed the loophole.

John McDonnell: Health and safety has been mentioned. Has the Health and Safety Executive made a health and safety assessment? It has not been reported to any Committee. No offence has been alleged under health and safety legislation.

Sir George Young: I am sure that the Health and Safety Executive will note the hon. Gentleman's remarks, but if he talks informally to the policemen he will find that it is doing no good to the health of those who are confronted by that noise some 20 ft away at high volume, hour after hour. I hope that he does not try to defend what the policemen at the gates have to tolerate.

Liberty said:

> "If this legislation is passed, it could potentially endanger the rights of every single person in this country".

That is absurd. I hope that hon. Members will put the matter in some sort of perspective. We have well preserved, well used rights of protest in this country, but the activity in Parliament square goes beyond what is appropriate or reasonable in a mature democracy. One of the rights of a mature democracy is setting some acceptable parameters for freedom of expression. In my judgment, they are being exceeded.

Lembit Öpik: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir George Young: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, with whom I have debated the matter exhaustively in the media for most of the past 24 hours.

Lembit Öpik: I thank the right hon. Gentleman. Does he recall that we did one of those interviews in exactly the spot that he describes, across the road from Mr. Haw's demonstration? We could do that and be heard. He says that he is looking for a balance, but the status quo is the balance because we are considering non-violent, legal direct action that does not obstruct us in our activities. To go further would take away rights.

Sir George Young: I do not accept that the volume of noise is reasonable. I do not accept that we were interviewed in good conditions. The reporter was happy to conduct the interview there because the loudhailer noise made the point and gave the listener to the programme some idea of what was happening, but the conditions were not ideal.

We can all distinguish between a one-off, well-targeted demonstration for a day and a permanent encampment with constant high volume slogans and abuse.

Mr. Haw is entitled to protest in the same way as anyone else, and in a free country there are many opportunities to do so, but as I understand it there is nothing to stop others doing exactly what Mr. Haw is doing all the way round Parliament square. That is not something that I would welcome.

Finally, I should like to make an environmental point. We are discussing one of the most important historic sites in the world. We have here the Houses of Parliament, Westminster abbey, Whitehall, the Churchill statue and the Guildhall, but the eye and ear are drawn towards the unsightly cacophony in the middle. We simply have not got the balance right. No other democracy in the world would tolerate what is happening in Parliament square, with a shanty town right opposite Parliament. There is no history of protest at this location; it is not like Hyde Park corner. There is a loophole in the law, and an abuse that has been going on for far too long. I support the Government in their attempts to put that right.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) wants to create an antiseptic tourist attraction round here that has nothing to do with democracy or participation, and the suggestion that Brian Haw's presence outside is somehow damaging to the buildings is pushing it a bit. Brian Haw is there because he believes in something. Surely, in a democracy, we should welcome people who believe in something and who are prepared to make that statement.

This debate on Sessional Orders is very interesting and important. I gave evidence to the Committee on this matter, and I hope that the Ministers will think very carefully about what they are proposing here. We seem to be inviting the police to take certain actions concerning the presence of people in Parliament square, without being specific about the powers under which they would do so, on the basis that legislation on the issue will be proposed at some point in the future. That sets a dangerous precedent. If we accept it, the police will act in a certain way, having been given a kind of nod from Parliament as to how we now believe that Sessional Orders should operate, and, at some point in the indeterminate future, legislation that we shall have a chance to debate will appear. Unless something dramatic happens during the Minister's wind-up speech—which would surprise me—I shall vote against these proposals because I think that that is the right thing to do.

We have a duty to protect the right of free speech around Parliament just as much as have a duty to protect the right of Members to get to Parliament—that was the basis of some of the Sessional Orders—and we must ensure that that remains the case. During the Select Committee hearing, there seemed to be quite a lot of confusion about the rights of access to Parliament. It is perfectly clear that MPs must have the right to get to Parliament, otherwise a tyrannical situation could arise in which they were prevented from getting here and would therefore be unable to vote, resulting in legislation being carried or not, as the case may be. It is essential that they have that democratic right, because they are here to represent the people. However, the suggestion that a demonstration in the centre of Parliament square somehow impedes Members getting to the House is unbelievably absurd. Nobody would walk down Whitehall, cross two roads to get to the centre of the square, then cross two more to get into the building. That is absurd; they simply would not do it.

Mr. McWalter: Was it not the case that, during the hunting demonstration, those of us coming to Parliament by car were prevented from getting here?

Jeremy Corbyn: That is so. That demonstration was organised with the co-operation and consent of the Metropolitan police, and had nothing whatever to do with Brian Haw and his demonstration in the middle of Parliament square. Indeed, I received a copy of a letter sent to Brian Haw by the Metropolitan police suggesting that he might like to be somewhere else that day, because they thought that his presence might not be compatible with the aims of the hunting lobby. I do not know what Brian did, but I suspect that he probably stayed there.

Mr. Bercow: There is, of course, a distinction between liberty and licence. The hon. Gentleman champions Mr. Haw's right to articulate his views, but does he not accept that the right to free speech has to be exercised within a context? There must be some limitation and control because it is not a self-regarding act. This is an act that has an effect—many of us would argue that it is an unacceptable and damaging effect—on the rights of others. If the hon. Gentleman accepts that there has to be some limit, in terms of time and/or intensity of expression, where would he place that limit?

Jeremy Corbyn: I am deeply disappointed with that intervention. I was hoping that the statements in the weekend press about the hon. Gentleman's rapid move to the left—passing new Labour on the way—had real substance. Indeed, I was in his constituency on Sunday evening discussing just that matter with some of his constituents, and they were very interested.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, because he has given me a welcome opportunity to exercise, in order, my right to free speech. I have always been a Tory, I am a Tory and I have to tell him and his relatives who live in my constituency that I will die a Tory.

Jeremy Corbyn: If I had not given way so soon, I could have explained to the hon. Gentleman that the conclusion of our lengthy conversation was that he was a Tory, is a Tory and will remain a Tory. In those circumstances, grateful as they are for his work as their Member, they will never be able to vote for him. I am sure he understands the democratic context in which those remarks were made.

To return to the issue of the right of free speech outside the House, Brian Haw's presence has never prevented anybody else from demonstrating or expressing a point of view. He has resided there because he believes passionately that this country's policy towards Iraq is wrong and that we should not be associated with the war. He has established a presence there and become a focal point. I think that what upsets Members who supported the war, who walk, drive or cycle to Westminster, is being reminded of that by his presence. They do not like it and feel slightly irritated by it.

I was irritated at times by the presence of the hunting lobby in the centre of Parliament square, but, as those Members who have read the Select Committee report will know, evidence was given to that Committee by the hon. Members for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) and for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) and by me. It was a rare afternoon out when the hon. Gentleman, the hon. Lady and I all agreed on the need to protect the right to demonstrate. We made that point very clearly.

I want to make two quick points. First, there is no universal right of assembly, march or demonstration, although perhaps there should be. That was removed by the Public Order Act 1986, which was passed by Parliament and which requires police permission to have a demonstration, unless the police allow an unusual demonstration to take place. The fact that someone says that Brian Haw has outlived his usefulness proves just how useful and important he is. He should be congratulated on that.

I was thinking about long-term demonstrations that I have visited at different times and at various places in this country and around the world. The presence of one person making a point, taking sanctuary or making a public protest is very powerful. Sun Yat-sen occupied a place in London and became a figure of Chinese nationalism at the start of the 20th century, while the presence of Aboriginal land rights demonstrators outside the Australian Parliament has continued for years. There is a peace camp outside the White House, which has gone on for years. There was a demonstration for a long time—1,000 days, indeed—outside the United States embassy to bring US troops out of Vietnam. Those who organised it said, "We will stay here until the troops go."

I took part in a vigil that lasted many years outside South Africa house. I was there at the beginning. Indeed, along with my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Mr. Banks), I was arrested and told that I was obstructing the pavement. Then the charge was changed to acting in a way that was deliberately offensive to a foreign embassy based in London. As it was the apartheid regime's foreign embassy, I could do nothing but plead guilty with honour to that charge. The charge was thrown out, and the demonstration therefore won the right to be outside South Africa house and it stayed there until the apartheid regime was ended. So, there are plenty of examples.

Did not the women who stayed on Greenham Common for all those years play a major part in promoting the cause of nuclear disarmament, in exactly the same way as those demonstrating currently at Menwith Hill? We owe our rights to those who have been prepared to stand up and express them.

Lembit Öpik: On exactly that point, is it not interesting that those who are in defence of Brian Haw consider his motivations for the demonstration, while those who oppose the likes of him simply consider the inconvenience caused to themselves by the demonstration? Does not that prove that the essence of such a demonstration is to try to get people who consider it an inconvenience to listen to the fundamental reason why such a person has inconvenienced himself by virtually living outside the Palace of Westminster?

Jeremy Corbyn: I could not agree more with the hon. Gentleman. I happen to agree with what Brian Haw says, but if others were there, such as the pig farmers, I would not have to agree with them. I would respect their right to be there and to express their point of view—

Mr. Salmond: Or, for that matter, the demonstration for five years outside the Scottish Office, which Conservative Secretaries of State for Scotland wished to have removed, as we now know, but could find nothing in the law of Scotland to support the removal. That makes it all the more disappointing that Labour Members apparently want to go ahead with this mumbo-jumbo.

Jeremy Corbyn: I did not get involved in the demonstration outside the Scottish Office, but it had an important effect, as demonstrations do. Members who are prepared to pass this motion should think for a moment about where our democratic rights came from. Were they handed down, or were they gained because people were prepared to demonstrate and demand a freely elected Parliament? Did not the Chartists make a great contribution to the history of this country from which we draw many of our rights? We should be very careful about taking away the rights of others on fairly spurious grounds, as we are doing at present. It becomes the start of a slippery slope.

Demonstrations are inconvenient and a nuisance, and different points of view are sometimes not believed to be acceptable. But if we want to live in a free and democratic society, we must protect the right of those who are prepared to stand up and speak for a cause, outside this place, and remind us day in, day out that the decisions that we take have effects elsewhere, all the way over in Iraq or wherever. I ask Members tonight to think of our democratic values and not to support the proposals.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): The hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) made an extremely powerful case for the protection of witnesses. Witnesses are not well enough protected, and it would send the wrong signal to strike that out of the opening remarks of the Session. Instead the Government should consider ways of strengthening the position of witnesses, especially vulnerable witnesses such as civil servants, whose testimony is often crucial. Until that strengthening has occurred, I hope that we will keep in place the stern warning from Mr. Speaker at the beginning of the Session that witnesses will get, and deserve, the protection of the House. We then need to think about how we can do that.

The hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) was right to say that there are occasions when right hon. and hon. Members have their passage to the House delayed. It would be good if the whole House, through the Speaker, said to the police at the beginning of each Session that we expect them—our friends on our side—to make sure that all Members in possession of their passes are given quick and free passage, whatever may be going on outside. There have been occasions of state visits that have led to delays and impediments to Members getting through, and policed demonstrations when Members have been delayed or detained and not able to get through. I am sure that the police would want to help us, and it would be good if the whole House united to say that Members in possession of their passes, or well-known Members whom the police can identify, should be let through as a matter of urgency and courtesy. Members have sometimes been delayed in getting into the House to debate and vote on the very issues about which the demonstrators are complaining. Surely all demonstrators in a free and democratic society would wish to see elected Members having the opportunity to be in the House when such important matters are being discussed

My third point relates to the proposed change of words with the suggestion that a form of words connected with the duties and responsibilities of Members should be used instead at the beginning of the Session. It is difficult for us to make a judgment tonight, as we are not in possession of whatever that form of words might be. I suspect that if we asked all Members to jot down on a piece of paper how they would define "duties and responsibilities" we would see variations and nuances on a large scale, although we trust that there would be some family resemblance. It would, I think, prove contentious and difficult. It would be odd of us to sweep away existing words before knowing that we had a much better form of words in the spirit of modernisation that the Government and the Committee suggest. The devil could well be in the detail, and I am reluctant to sign up until I have seen a difficult task carried out successfully.

Having observed the passions and disagreements that have arisen today over demonstrations, let me suggest that it is a question of balance. Some of us are on the side of free demonstrations, while others are more interested in having a beautiful square with law and order. Everyone is somewhere on the spectrum. I think that the issue will be resolved by Government proposals on legislation, and I do not think Members should be swayed by proposals on Sessional Orders tonight. There should be plenty of time for debate when legislation is before us. As the Government have made clear, this issue cannot be resolved without primary legislation. That, surely, is the time for a strong and passionate debate—again, about wording, so that we can decide whether the balance has been struck in the right way.

I hope that Members will bear that in mind when deciding whether to accept this rather rushed change, in the absence of all the improvements and modernisations that we have been promised.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): I can count on the fingers of one hand the number of occasions on which I have agreed with the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), but this just might be one of them. How on earth are Members to judge whether this new form of words, this mission statement from the code of conduct, this splendid encapsulation of the duties and responsibilities of a Member of Parliament, is better than the Sessional Orders, without seeing the form of words with which we are being invited to replace them? Given the complaint from various Committee Chairmen that this has taken too long, we might have expected to see the alternative formulation by now.

I have no doubt that others involved in this will come up with some splendid formulae, but I must say I have always thought that the Good News Bible does not quite capture the majesty of the King James version.

Mr. Swayne: Perhaps we might give each other a sign of peace.

Mr. Salmond: I join the Conservative ranks, in a constitutional sense, just in the context of this particular aspect, and to sound some warnings.

With due deference to the distinguished Chairman of the Procedure Committee, let me say that the fact that something has not been used for a while does not always mean that it is not necessary. We have not seen a motion for impeachment in the House since 1848, but in the current circumstances—against the current Prime Minister—it is very important that it remains available to Members of Parliament. The fact that some of the protections conferred by the Sessional Orders have not been used for a while does not mean that they are not important.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Does the hon. Gentleman not take seriously the advice of the Clerk of the House, who is a servant not of Government, not of Opposition, but of the House? His recommendation was very much along the lines of the recommendations in the report.

Mr. Salmond: I am not concerned about whether the Chairman of the Procedure Committee took seriously the recommendations of the Clerk of the House; I am concerned about the fact that—not showing his usual robust independence—he did not perceive the flaws and difficulties with which such advice presents us this evening. Under the guise of convenience, modernisation and "wrapping things up", we see the mishmash of nonsense that we are being invited to support when no one can even explain the reasons for the change in the wording of the sessional order.

I believe, and I think other Members agree, that the new phrase

"to hinder Members by any means"

might refer to noise pollution. We are assured that that preoccupied the Committee and preoccupies certain Members, but I do not think it is worth the candle if it means restricting the right and freedom to demonstrate that some Members have mentioned. They are not thinking of themselves, of course; they are thinking of the poor policemen and members of staff.

The reality, as anybody who has attended business questions knows, is that those Members do not like the message coming through the loudhailers. It is not the loudhailers that they object to, but the occasional pricks to their bloated consciences. We should see through this cant and humbug and question why on earth we are being asked to buy a pig in a poke, to support formulations that nobody can explain, and to reject the Sessional Orders when we do not even have their replacement before us this evening.

I became concerned when I read the Procedure Committee's report. Despite my enormous admiration for the Committee Chairman, I was aghast to read the exchange between him and the Serjeant at Arms concerning the difficulties that the police experienced during a children's demonstration in forcibly removing them when they lay down in front of the House of Commons. Rather than understanding that there might be some difficulties and sensitivities in terms of how the police carry out such duties—just as might occur in dealing with a disabled demonstration—the Chairman said in response the Serjeant at Arms that there was "Almost anarchy!" I suppose that we should be surprised that he thought it "almost" anarchy. Usually, in his ebullience, he would have thought it true anarchy. Many of us, regardless of the proclivity of these children to take an unauthorised day off school, were actually rather glad to discover that so many members of the younger generation were thinking about something more than what was going to happen in that evening's soap, and that they wanted to come to this place to demonstrate about an issue that they thought particularly important.

Some people address these issues as if there is something absolutely special about Members of Parliament. Well, there are two things that are special, the first of which is the right of privilege: the fundamental right of Members to say what they like without the encumbrance of any threat of action against them. Secondly, there is a fundamental right of access, as all who have spoken in this debate agree. Over and above that, there is no need for special rights, or for protection for Members against noise pollution entering their place of work. On the contrary, there should be additional rights to demonstrate around Parliament, not less. We should want people to demonstrate around here; the time to worry is when nobody can be bothered to do so.

Mr. Haw, who has spent three years outside this place, seems to preoccupy many Members. Indeed, the preoccupation is such that the Committee said:

> "The Government should introduce appropriate legislation to prohibit long-term demonstrations".

Unusually, a Member with the sanity and perception of the Committee Chairman is telling us that it is only "long-term demonstrations" that the Committee objects to, and that the occasional short-term demonstration will be okay. He is worried about the crowding out by Mr. Haw of other demonstrations. He is worried about the intimidation of thousands of huntsmen and women by this one man's demonstration, which apparently occupies too much space in Parliament square. That such a distinguished and insightful Member can come before us with such nonsense suggests that he has been over-influenced by some of our more sensitive souls. They cannot see beyond their own minor inconvenience to detecting something in the Sessional Orders—about the right to demonstrate—that might be important in terms of protecting our rights and the people's rights.

So I shall join the rebellious Labour Back Benchers and others who are concerned about the suborning of witnesses, although I suspect that the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) could have given us more recent examples of Committees being influenced. We look forward to his memoirs and to accounts of more recent Committees in which he has participated, to see whether such things do in fact happen. I shall join that rebellion and share the concern of those who want to maintain freedom of speech, and I shall insist—if I can—that we see what we are meant to be voting for before we fling out the Sessional Orders. They may be archaic and arcane. They may not be noticed by many hon. Members at the start of each Session, but I suspect that they contain some things of greater importance than the grumblings of a few Conservative MPs and the inability of Government Front Benchers to detect anything of historic significance in them.

In particular, I note that the Leader of the House is a man who specialised in demonstrations in the early stages of his career and I think that he was absolutely right to campaign on those issues. Yet he now comes before us to support proposals whose purpose is, inter alia, to obstruct and restrict a gentleman who has done nobody any harm and is demonstrating for a cause that is fundamentally good.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I rise to support the views expressed by the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) and others because I believe that we really have a personal responsibility to defend the rights of those who have a quieter voice than ourselves.

As I have said before, we are greatly privileged to be able to express our views directly in the House to decision makers and those who run the country, and at the same time to have them expressed occasionally through the media, whether it be on television, radio or in newspapers. By comparison, our man outside, Brian Haw, has proved that people have to work pretty damn hard to get heard and have a voice by proxy in this place. To his great credit, we have had what amounts to a three-hour debate prompted in large part by his three-and-a-half year sacrifice and his willingness to inconvenience himself by virtually living outside the Palace of Westminster in the daytime.

Other hon. Members have spoken about balancing the right to demonstrate with other concerns. I would suggest that we have the balance about right in this country. I do not need to repeat what others have said—that Brian Haw presents no danger to us; that he has not restricted our ability to come in and out of the premises. He is clearly a non-violent demonstrator, and as we know, he does not even break the law. As far as I am concerned, introducing legislation to outlaw such behaviour is in itself a crime.

I also cannot help wondering whether, if the message were different, we would be having this debate. If Brian Haw stood with his megaphone on Wednesdays as the Prime Minister left Downing street and shouted, "Up with the Prime Minister; we want four more years!" or shouted out to the Ministers before us today, "Long live the hon. Member for Don Valley!" or "Good luck to the hon. Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth. We love you!", would we be debating this gentleman as a dangerous scourge on society?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Yes.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Gentleman merely expresses his own vain envy because I mentioned Ministers rather than himself, but I am sure that with a couple of words across the road, Brian Haw would give the thumbs up to him as well. I suggest that it is, at least in part, the message that causes us to have the current debate.

Prohibiting long-term demonstrations itself brings about all sorts of difficulties. How might such legislation be implemented? The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) suggested that the problem with having Brian Haw there all the time is that there could be a long list of other people who would like to demonstrate there, too. I assume therefore that he would have no problem if Brian Haw decided to do a hot megaphone—in other words, operated a rota with two or three other people. There would always be demonstration going on, but not on the same matter.

Perhaps we could have a demonstration against the war in Iraq on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays; we could have another gentleman opposing the war in Afghanistan on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays; and on Sundays we could have someone who generally objected to the Government's foreign policies such as the sale of arms to the very people we are now having to attack. There would be three demonstrations in a week rather than one long-term demonstration. That is the sort of preposterous position we get into once we accept that people are allowed to demonstrate without restriction, but not in one continuous blast.

I accept that people are uncomfortable or inconvenienced by what Mr. Haw and other people like him do, but that is not a good enough reason to prevent them from having the opportunity to demonstrate if they want to. It strikes me as very telling that people who support such demonstrations tend to consider the motivations of those who demonstrate, while those who would curtail the demonstrations tend to consider the inconvenience to themselves. The irony is that demonstrations become effective only when some inconvenience is caused.

That is the heart of the matter, and I support those who have argued so eloquently about the importance of giving a voice to people who are willing to inconvenience themselves to raise a concern. In this case, we are talking about Brian Haw, but the principle applies to the nation.

Mr. Mega—[Interruption.] I was going to say Mr. Megaphone, because it seems that I am fixated with that word. Mr. Deputy Speaker, I was going to conclude by saying that megaphone diplomacy is alive and well in Parliament square. Its guardian is a man called Brian Haw. We are guardians of democracy and have the right and responsibility to look after his interests. It is an old truism to say, for reasons that we have heard many times before, that although some of us may abhor what Brian Haw says, if we are serious about democracy we are duty bound to defend to the end his right to say it.

6.56 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I want to mention a couple of things that have not been talked about much so far. First, I draw the House's attention to paragraph 6 of the report, which gives the lie to a lot of what has been said about what this is about. It states that > "in the absence of an Order of Business for the first day of a Session, the Orders and Resolutions are proposed to the House without notice and have to be read out in full: they have on occasion given rise to debate and even (in 1984) a division."

That shows that the report is about cleaning up, controlling and disciplining what happens in this House, in case it should inconvenience the Government or hon. Members at large. It seems that we must never have surprises in this House any more, or anything that is unpredictable or that might upset the Government. I am afraid that we are seeing that sort of thing repeatedly these days.

I should have thought that hon. Members would welcome the spontaneity that could arise from some of our rather quaint traditions. We should not want everything to be so ordered, arranged and controlled that we know exactly what is going to happen, but we are moving in that direction. I am sad to say that the report takes that process a step further.

Paragraph 10 of the report contains what I consider to be the following impertinence. It states that > "the Sessional Orders and Resolutions . . . should be replaced by a statement of the duties and responsibilities of Members, possibly the seven principles of public life as set out in the Code of Conduct".

That is nonsense: Members of Parliament define their responsibilities and account to their voters for them. We do not want to start getting involved in job descriptions and procedure manuals that tell us how to do our job, but it appears that that is what underlies that supposedly innocent proposal involving a > "statement of the duties and responsibilities of Members".

I know that a lot of hon. Members regard themselves effectively as social workers, and not even very glorified ones, but a few of us still cling to the view that it is the variation in the attitude that they take to their responsibilities—and their definition of those responsibilities—that is the essence of what it means to be a Member of Parliament. If we start to move away from that, we shall diminish even further the already diminished role that we have created for ourselves.

We are making rather heavy weather of this very important issue involving demonstrations and the balance between freedom and discipline. Some time ago, I suggested to the Leader of the House that we institute a very simple rule stipulating that Parliament square be cleared between sunset and sunrise every day. That would be one way of dealing with the problem of whether a demonstration is continuous, for example.

My other suggestion would be to ban voice amplification. People would be perfectly free to forgather and use their voices in an acceptable way, but they would not be allowed to set up the permanent encampments that have arisen. That would be a reasonable balance between maintaining people's freedom to be in Parliament square opposite the House of Commons and express a point of view, either individually or collectively, and the need to maintain some sort of discipline.

Mr. Salmond: The right hon. Gentleman clings to a view, which I support, of his rights as a Member of Parliament, so why cannot he cling to the idea that there are rights for people who want to demonstrate to Members of Parliament?

Mr. Forth: I have no desire to stop people demonstrating. They could gather freely in Parliament square, as long as they did not permanently camp there, because if a large enough number of them did so, it might prevent others from demonstrating. There should be some equity. The noise thing is relevant, too. There are probably some fairly simple and elegant solutions to the problem, and I hope that we can find them, rather than being too heavy-handed.

7 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): I have waited seven long years to find something in common with the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn). My wait has been fulfilled today, because like him, I have been arrested for demonstrating in public. I have even been locked up in a cell for demonstrating in public, and one of the reasons for that was that I made too much amplified noise in public.

Mr. Bercow: Will my hon. Friend tell the House whether he informed the selection committee of the New Forest, East Conservative association of that important fact before he was selected?

Dr. Lewis: I am sure that had I done so, the good burghers of New Forest, East would have made a far wiser selection than, in the event, they did.

In May 1982, there was a huge demonstration going up Whitehall, led by Arthur Scargill and Tony Benn, against the taskforce that was deploying to fight in the Falklands war, so I and a number of friends and colleagues ambushed—as it were—the demonstration from the rooftops, playing at excessively loud volume Her Majesty's national anthem. That led the police to arrest me and others on the ground that by playing the national anthem we might so upset the serried ranks of Trotskyites, communists and other agitators marching in the main demonstration as to cause a breach of the peace.

Jeremy Corbyn: I have to inform the hon. Gentleman that he did not upset us at all. We quite enjoyed it and thought it was a bit of fun. Not one person on the demonstration requested that he or anybody else be arrested for mounting any form of counter-demonstration. There was a spirit of democracy about the event.

Dr. Lewis: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman made that intervention, as I should now like to tell him what happened next.

People felt that the police had been a tad heavy-handed, so on future demonstrations, in October 1983 and June 1984, we mounted similar counter-demonstrations, by arrangement with the police. The council—I think it was Westminster—sent along an officer with a decibel meter, and whatever may or may not have happened in 1982, there were plenty of protests from the demonstrators to that environmental officer. He kept telling us, "If you don't turn it down, we'll confiscate your equipment." In those days, it was possible to hold a major demonstration with a minor counter-demonstration and to have a certain balance of forces so that both sides could put their point across.

Mr. Salmond: To boil it down to its essence, the hon. Gentleman is saying that 20 years ago he was arrested for noise disturbance and now he wants to arrest everybody else who—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. Unusually, I think I need say no more.

Dr. Lewis: Would that life were as simple as the hon. Gentleman suggests. What I am actually saying is that somewhere between then and now there has been a change in the law. There has been a change in the rules and it looks as though it must have been brought in under the last Conservative Government in the Environmental Protection Act 1990, because according to a letter sent to me by Westminster council,

> "section 79(1)(ga) defines noise that is prejudicial to health or a nuisance and is emitted or caused by a vehicle, machinery or equipment in a street, as a statutory nuisance. However, section 79(6A) provides that section 79(1)(ga) does not apply to noise made by a political demonstration or a demonstration supporting or opposing a cause or a campaign."

The fact is, we have heard a lot of humbug talked about freedom of speech. We have freedom of speech in this Chamber; we each put forward our differing views. When we have had our say, we let the other person have his. We sit down, we shut up and we listen. We do not go on shouting in the face of the other person whether he wants to listen or not. We obey the rules. That is not happening in Parliament square.

I have taken the trouble to go across and have extensive conversations with Brian Haw and I take much very much to heart the comments of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), who tried to suggest that those of us who oppose the racket that Brian is making do so because we hate his message. I ask the hon. Gentleman and others to accept my sincerity when I say that I would take the same approach to anyone who demonstrated in the same way for a cause in which I passionately believed and who went on making a racket that was designed not to address the people who had come to hear the message but to penetrate the building of people who were trying to get on with their work, looking after the interests of their constituents.

Perhaps some of those who speak so glibly about the noise have offices that are somewhat better insulated than mine, but I assure them that it is very difficult to do one's work when there is a constant racket and a barrage of noise the words of which cannot even be heard clearly. It is a row, and it is made not to get a message across or in the interests of free speech but to harass and annoy parliamentarians. That is the beginning and end of it. Nothing other than a change in the law will prevent this abuse from continuing.

I am relatively agnostic on whether or Brian or anybody else ought to be able to demonstrate in Parliament square. I have spoken to him and I admire his commitment to his cause. I will make a point that no one else has made. I know that one of his motivations results from the fact that his father went into and liberated one of the Nazi concentration camps. With my family background, I have every reason to hold anyone motivated in that way in the highest regard.

I do not think that Brian used to make all this noise in the earlier part of his campaign, and when he did not make the noise and just put his message across, I had very little, if anything, to say about what he was doing. However, I now think that he has taken freedom of speech into areas that become an abuse of free speech. There is no freedom to impinge on the freedom of other people. That is what he is doing.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): We have had a very interesting debate, with 13 speeches from the Back Benches in addition to those from the Front-Bench Opposition spokespersons.

As a Home Office Minister, I will concentrate on the demonstrations in Parliament square, and while there has been a great deal of discussion about one individual, the legislation that we will introduce is not just about that individual: it is about dealing with a number of issues relating to both long-term and short-term demonstrations in the area around Parliament. It is important to address such issues.

The Mayor of London took part in the consultation and a summary of his response shows that he believes > "in an individual's right to protest but must be balanced with the security of protection from harassment and that protests outside Parliament are addressed. Londoners' safety could be seriously jeopardised by violent demonstrations around Parliament and Parliament Square. Current legislation provides a degree of safety for the Houses of Parliament, however recent demonstrations suggests they are insufficient."

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) and I worked for the Mayor when the Greater London council existed, and the Mayor makes an interesting point.

I too have demonstrated, and perhaps like other Members, I remember the time when I could not cross Westminster bridge to demonstrate. There has been much discussion about the right to free speech and to demonstrate, but some of the contributions to the debate suggested that that right does not exist in this country. The right does exist in this country, and it does so to a much greater extent than in many other countries throughout the world, including Iraq under Saddam Hussein, whom Mr. Haw advocated that we should do nothing about. The matter is important, and as the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) said, we must examine the detail of the legislation when we introduce it.

Let me touch on several points raised by hon. Members.

Mr. Salmond rose—

Caroline Flint: We have heard a lot of contributions and I will not have time to deal with the points made by hon. Members if I give way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington asked about consultation. Consultation has occurred on new police powers and we have seen the publication of the consultation paper, "Modernising Police Powers to Meet Community Needs". The public consultation process lasted for 12 weeks and closed only recently.

Like several hon. Members, the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) suggested that the powers were being designed to deal with only one individual. I do not know whether this will reassure him, but I re-emphasise the fact that the plans that we intend to introduce will allow the police to place conditions on all short and long-term demonstrations in the vicinity of Parliament.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) on his work on the Procedure Committee and thank him for his support. He raised a point about the important question of passes. Police officers and staff of the House who ask to see people's passes do so because they are trying to protect us and our security. I am sometimes guilty of not wearing my pass, but I am glad to do so today. We must appreciate the situation and act responsibly.

The Chairman of the Procedure Committee, the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), made an excellent speech. He has been accused of many things during the debate, such as preventing Parliament from scrutinising the Executive and doing away with traditions that should be part and parcel of Parliament in the future. He is the last person who could be accused of doing such things. He and his colleagues on the Procedure Committee have tried to make sensible suggestions about the way forward and have rightly taken heed of hon. Members' concerns. In preparation for our debate, I read the report of the Westminster Hall debate—I did not attend it—in which many hon. Members participated, including the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), to express people's worries about the way in which free speech can sometimes be abused. There must be a sense of order behind the way in which free speech may be expressed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) raised several points about witnesses. I am assured by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and my hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House that his worries about witnesses are covered by other statutes. As the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire said, a debate is currently being held within the Liaison Committee on whether there is a clear way in which witnesses who are brought before Committees could be advised of their rights and responsibilities when giving evidence, which is a good idea.

Mr. McWalter: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Caroline Flint: I have only a few minutes in which to speak, so I shall not give way to my hon. Friend on this occasion.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire made a balanced contribution. The Government do not intend to ban demonstrations, so we are in accord with him on that point. We are saying that, given the times in which we live, we must consider hon. Members' access to Parliament and the protection of not only Members of Parliament and those who work here but other people who meet and gather in the square. When we introduce the legislation, we will have a full chance to debate how we may achieve that and deal with the obvious problems that exist while maintaining people's right to protest. It is absurd to suggest that the actions that we intend to take will deny people the right to express their views.

Mr. Tyler rose—

Caroline Flint: I am sorry, but I will not give way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) asked about police permission. Police permission must be given for marches under section 2 of the Public Order Act 1986. However, it is not necessary to obtain advance police permission for assemblies.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham made a point about witness protection, but as I said, I am advised that that matter is covered elsewhere. He mentioned the important question of MPs' access to the House. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House mentioned the fact that one of our colleagues in the House was assaulted during a recent demonstration. She was simply making her way from her office in No. 1 Parliament Street to the House.

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill) raised the statement of principles, which I am advised will be looked at by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire, who chairs the Select Committee on Standards and Privileges. Mr. Speaker will make a statement to the House, and it will be for the House to endorse it. I agree that we need to strike a balance when dealing with the many problems in Parliament square raised by hon. Members.

The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) repeated a number of points made by my hon. Friends the Members for Hayes and Harlington and for Islington, North. He said that the message would be stopped, but as was rightly pointed out, one cannot hear or understand a message blared out by a loudhailer. People have the right to protest, and we could have a long debate about whether the protest outside has been particularly effective in changing policy—I suggest that it has not. The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), I am afraid, accused the hon. Member for Macclesfield of helping the Executive to storm their way through the House without due process or scrutiny. I have already said that that is not the case. He also raised the issue of the statement, and I believe that I have already explained how the process will operate. He agreed with other hon. Members that we must do something about certain types of demonstration that have come to the fore in recent times.

The hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) suggested that there was a split in the New forest.

Dr. Julian Lewis: For the first time ever.

Caroline Flint: Surely not the last. The hon. Gentleman shared his interesting experiences of demonstrating—

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question, pursuant to Order [2 November].

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of the Third Report of the Procedure Committee, Session 2002–03, on Sessional Orders and Resolutions, HC 855, and the Government's Response thereto (published as the Committee's Third Special Report of the current Session, HC 613); approves the proposals set out in paragraphs 9, 10 and 25 of the Report for changes in the practice of the House at the beginning of each Session; and, as recommended in paragraph 9(b), makes the following provision:

That all Members of this House who are returned for two or more places in any part of the United Kingdom should choose for which of the places they will serve, within one week after it appears that there is no question about their election for that place.

Sharpness Docks

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Woolas.]

7.28 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to have this opportunity to discuss Sharpness docks, and I am also delighted to see the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins), on the Front Bench. I was slightly surprised when I learned that she was responding to this debate, but in the spirit of comradeship that we have in our party, and given that the subject is docks, I am sure that the Department for Transport is as relevant as the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which is the managing Department.

I apologise for the state of my voice—I have not been to voice training recently, but I have got the lurgy, so if I suddenly splutter, it is because of that and not for some other reason. Sharpness docks are close to my heart because I used to visit them when I was a child. Some of us can remember the days when people used to go out on Sunday afternoon car trips, and I used to go and watch the ships in Sharpness docks, which might show what a sad life I led as a child. There used to be a lovely ship, the Vindicatrix, in Sharpness docks. It was a training ship, and people who trained on it—the Vindi boys—always have an annual reunion. It still sticks in the memory.

It might surprise people to hear that my constituency contains docks, because most think that Stroud is somewhere inland near the Cotswolds, but we have long-established docks that are quite important. Sharpness docks is one of three inland waterway terminals still owned by British Waterways, and I contend that it is an important facility that is in need of some investment. The docks stand on the tidal upper reaches of the Severn estuary: the tidal range of up to 10 m is slightly less than at Avonmouth, 17 miles downstream. Ships carrying up to about 3,500 tonnes of cargo regularly pass through the port—I am pleased that their number has increased over the past three years—and it is possible to take some further up the Gloucester and Sharpness canal, which can take ships up to 900 deadweight tonnes, although the canal is mainly used by leisure craft now.

The river up to Sharpness is one of compulsory pilotage. I am bringing this matter to the attention of the House because of a report undertaken by the pilots which voices concern about the state of the docks. The pilots bring in vessels over 100 deadweight tonnes; they are part of a consortium, the Gloucester Pilots Partnership, which is under contract to Gloucester Harbour Trustees, which is the competent harbour authority. The trustees also provide the navigation aids in the harbour, which extends from the Maisemore and Llanthony weirs at Gloucester to seaward of the Severn road bridges. They provide comprehensive navigation lights cover and an advanced pilot watch radar system to help to guide shipping through the bridges, especially the deep water channel—known as "the Shoots"—under the second Severn crossing.

It is estimated that the docks date back to 1827, but it was only towards the end of the 19th century, in 1874, when the new docks opened and the Severn-Wye railway bridge was completed, that the thoroughfare became important for both water and rail transport. The potential use of coal in the forest of Dean—one of the reasons for building the railway and opening up the port—was never really realised. None the less, the facility has been important: connected to the Gloucester and Sharpness canal, it has always served its purpose.

In 1997, the quayside operations of British Waterways were transferred on a 125-year lease to Sharpness Dock Ltd., or SDL, a wholly owned subsidiary of the Victoria group based in Plymouth. The dry dock facility is separately leased to Sharpness Shipyard and Dry Dock Ltd. I wish to express my respect for Mark Gatehouse of SDL, who has seen the docks through a difficult period to the pleasing point at which they appear to be on the up. That is proved by the recent trading position, which shows the tonnage passing through the docks rising from almost 470,000 in 1994–95 to 1, 235,722 in 2002–03. Although the tonnage fell slightly last year, we still think that the port is doing quite well.

The reason for my present concern is a report that I received from Gloucester Harbour Trustees. I pay tribute to those who helped me understand its relevance and prepare this speech, including my old friend Bob Hall, who has been a harbour trustee for many years, Mike Johnson, who helped to edit his notes, and Gary Strickland of SDL. The report highlights the fact that parts of the docks are in a poor state of repair. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to obtain her own copy of the report, but if she cannot, I shall leave one with her. The report shows that the dry dock, and particularly the dolphins and the area where material is loaded and unloaded, is in need of repair.

I have always believed that the dock has a good future as long as it is invested in. The problem is that there are nearly £6 million of arrears in relation to investment, and I should like progress to be made on how British Waterways can be encouraged to take forward a strategy to bring the docks up to a decent state of repair.

We must recognise that the report is worthy of action. By chance, before it was published—although I had been given notice that it was in its incubation stage—I had my own meeting with BW back in September, where I met several people, including Roy Parker, the freight marketing manager, Stewart Sim, the operations director, and Ian Jarvis, the general manager for the south-west. We had an interesting couple of hours' discussion in which, having agreed that the docks have a future and that we are committed to assuring it, we explored some of the arguments. Bob Hall came along to that meeting. Although we left with a degree of optimism because of the commitment shown by the officials whom we met, that was not the same as being told where the money would come from.

There are two sides to this. We need to consider not only putting together a funding package to deal with some of the problems in relation to the docks' state of repair, but how to invest in freight use. No one pretends that it is possible to move dramatically from road to water, or from road to water and rail. However, it would be nice to think that the freight grants that are available to other forms of transport could be made available to inland waterways. That is germane not only to Sharpness but to all forms of inland waterway. Because they do not get access to the same level of grant, it is impossible to think about how to change things if and when the opportunity arises. I hope that that can happen at a more general level. It is no less than Sharpness deserves, and it would provide many opportunities to consider what could be achieved with the right level of capital investment and to how to use the revenue stream to move freight about in better and more sustainable ways.

In concluding my remarks to give my hon. Friend plenty of time to respond, I shall deal briefly with other issues relating to the Sharpness area. We cannot isolate the docks from their hinterland. The people who live there would not think of doing that, and I have no intention of arguing for it. I believe that the docks have a strong future. They are a good facility which, with the right level of capital investment, and with more revenue support, can be turned around to deal with the sort of tonnages of which we believe that they are capable. However, that depends on other factors.

The B4066 is the road to the docks. It is partly completed but it needs to be fully completed because of heavy vehicles driving through unsuitable areas. My constituents complain to me regularly about that. Again, we could do with a commitment to complete the road. I appreciate that that is subject to extant planning arrangements, but it would be useful to get a Government view about how progress can be made.

I shall not go into the details about the rail head because they are long and complicated, but we have been talking about trying to get a rail head for the past 10 years. It would act as a catalyst, because there would be a quick way of moving freight to the midlands, with intra-country shipping travelling from the east coast to the west coast, or directly from Spain. Ships bringing phosphates for our agriculture are some of the major users of the port. I want the rail head to be properly evaluated to ascertain how much it will cost. We have not got anywhere yet because the rail freight grant was lost, but I believe that there are still ways of providing a rail head.

On the negative side, there was the threat of an incinerator, which I strongly oppose. If hon. Members will excuse the pun, I believe that it is on the back burner now. However, the docks could be a potential source of an exciting development in waste. We have a firm, which used to be called Plasmega and has recently been taken over by Tarmac, that undertakes recycling. We want to encourage such industry on to the docks. It is an ideal centre for a waste recycling facility but it needs proper investment. We need to use the docks area appropriately.

At a time when Sharpness docks has the potential for expansion, we are in the process of examining what we need to do with Berkeley technology centre a few miles around the corner. It has a genuine impact on my constituency, with the potential loss of 1,100 jobs. We are considering an exciting taskforce investigation into how we can use the facility to develop a high-tech park. I should like some link between the docks, where some of the blue-collar work could take place, and the work that could go on in the Berkeley technology centre.

Other threats could derail matters. As I have said in this place on previous occasions, I have never been in favour of the Severn barrage. It could have a big impact on the docks. We do not seem to be making progress on that. Again, if such issues are being discussed in other places, they should be brought to the forefront of our deliberations about what we want to with the docks in future.

The docks have a future. They are capable of sustaining a good tonnage. Their facilities need to be repaired and brought up to standard so that they can be used not only now but in future. We need to get the infrastructure issues right and ensure that employment measures on the docks are suitable for the 21st century. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, in liaison with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, will give me some good news that we are serious about using inland waterways. That is not a pious dream but a way of securing a sustainable future.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) on securing the debate on the future of Sharpness docks. I am delighted that his debate is the first to which I have had an opportunity to respond.

The speech has highlighted the important role that smaller ports such as Sharpness can play in meeting the needs of business customers and in generating wealth locally and regionally. Although the heaviest traffic flows are concentrated in our biggest ports, providing vital facilities for container and bulk traffic such as oil and coal, there are more than 1,000 ports and terminals throughout the United Kingdom.

The Government do not run the ports industry. Some ports are run by local authorities, and others operate as independent trusts or are wholly in the private sector; all are run as commercial propositions.

Let me set out three key tenets of the Government's policy towards ports. We recognise that all ports have the potential to bring significant economic benefit to their hinterland, be it local or regional. We have ensured that the framework is in place to allow ports, large and small, to make the most of the opportunities that the market presents. The Government are firmly committed to encouraging more freight to be carried by water, where that offers the best value for money for our economy, environment and society.

Sharpness is an excellent example of what makes our ports industry successful. Under the new operator's entrepreneurial approach, traffic has climbed 50 per cent. since 1996, and it has already established itself as the eighth largest port in the south-west region, whose coastline stretches from Gloucester to Poole. Sharpness Docks Ltd has successfully developed its niche business in dry cargo in and out of the west midlands on short sea shipping services.

I fully understand my hon. Friend's keen interest in supporting the company's efforts to build on this success—it would clearly benefit his constituents, the region, and the Government's policy aims. Sharpness is unusual, in that the owner of the site, and the statutory port authority, is British Waterways, a public corporation. As the port authority, British Waterways is required to ensure that the port is fit for purpose and can safely be used by ships and other vessels. However, the maintenance requirements laid down by the Transport Act 1968 apply only to commercial and cruising waterways, and British Waterways is not obliged to maintain Sharpness docks to specified standards, except for the length of the Gloucester and Sharpness canal where it passes through the docks.

There are many demands on British Waterways' budget, but the Government have been increasing the funding for the corporation. Between 1999 and 2002, British Waterways was allocated an additional £24 million to eliminate its safety backlog over a seven-year period. A further £18 million was provided between 2002 and 2004 to enable it to reduce the backlog even more quickly. In addition, DEFRA has in the past few years given British Waterways a further ring-fenced payment of £30 million for infrastructure improvements to bring the network up to a sufficiently reliable standard to attract new business and opportunities to the waterways.

The Government and British Waterways clearly recognise the need to invest in Sharpness to repair and upgrade the existing port infrastructure. Indeed, British Waterways has identified a requirement for £4.1 million of remedial work that it would like to undertake over the next four to five years if available funds and priorities permit. This includes work on the tidal basin jetties and entrance locks. In fact, British Waterways is now considering the phasing of this work into its overall maintenance programme. If further proof were needed of British Waterways' commitment to the future development of Sharpness, I would point to the £500,000 already spent in refurbishing the middle lock gates in 2003–04, and the further £595,000 earmarked for the sea gates in 2006–07.

I assure my hon. Friend that British Waterways is committed to keeping the docks open, and, under its ongoing investment programme, it hopes to encourage a continuing increase in freight traffic through the port over the coming years. I am pleased to hear that BW is currently in discussion with Sharpness Docks Ltd to explore how the docks might be used for the movement of waste and recyclable material, and how the port might, once more, become the gateway for traffic on the Gloucester and Sharpness canal. In this context, it is good to see the return of significant quantities of aggregate traffic to the Severn further upstream, between Ripple, Ryan and Gloucester, supported by a £1 million freight facility grant from my Department. This is the first major freight traffic to flow on the Severn for more than 10 years. It will remove 340,000 lorry journeys from Gloucestershire's roads over the next 10 years, and bodes well for the revitalisation of this major UK waterway.

I also understand that Gloucestershire county council has taken a considerable interest in the future prosperity of Sharpness docks. The county is part of a European Union Atlantic Arc partnership studying the potential for increasing short-sea shipping. We look forward to the outcome of that study later this year.

The county has also been leading on the re-establishment of the docks railway system through the freight quality partnership and is offering to match-fund this work. That will establish a connection to the metal recycling plant at Sharpness, which has rail-connected sites in the west midlands. Discussions are also in hand with the port operator regarding the potential for rail and with a distribution firm regarding the potential for a rail-connected warehouse. The dockside could include a general purpose rail/road facility.

Mr. Drew: I congratulate my hon. Friend and hope that that will be followed up, because the company is Howard Tenens. I ask that the Department actively pursue it, as there has been some disagreement on the ground for all sorts of obvious reasons. This could be a real key to turning the docks into an even more successful employment, and dare I say development, opportunity.

Charlotte Atkins: I am sure that the Department will look favourably at that, because it is very much in line with our objectives.

The county council feels that the role of Sharpness as a port was overlooked in the past, as does my hon. Friend, but it clearly believes that Sharpness now offers an exciting opportunity for the county, with tremendous development potential. There is a good supply of employment land and relatively few planning constraints. The local plan has identified 19 hectares of development land, which could probably be easily increased.

The potential of Sharpness was recognised in the county council's local transport plan with an explicit policy aimed at encouraging the development of water freight at Sharpness dock. Another county policy promotes the creation of rail freight terminals, with Sharpness as one of the possible sites.

It is clear that Sharpness is in an excellent position to become a tri-modal freight facility for the region. There is a rail connection—mothballed but largely in good order, having been well maintained for nuclear traffic to Berkeley power station—and the Gloucester and Sharpness canal, connecting with the River Severn at Gloucester. It is only a few miles from the M5. I am pleased to report that the county council is making provision in its second local transport plan for funding to improve the road link from the M5 to Sharpness.

I understand that the county council, through the freight quality partnership, is establishing a project team to drive forward the creation of a tri-modal freight facility at Sharpness. Starting with the dock railway network, the county council will work with Stroud district council, British Waterways, the rail industry, the port operator and other private sector and stakeholder interests at Sharpness to develop and implement the project. The county council sees this as an excellent opportunity to reduce the amount of freight moved by road and to promote the use of rail and water—inland and short-sea—for the transport of goods.

The Department for Transport also recognises the role that Sharpness can play in meeting transport needs in the south-west region and further afield. Sharpness is already well positioned to develop further. It can be reached from the midlands by road without having to negotiate the congestion of the M4 and M5 in the Bristol area. It also has the potential to exploit good-quality rail and even canal access.

The Government are keen to take freight traffic off congested roads and we support short-sea shipping as a safe, environmentally friendly and sustainable mode of transport. Freight should be carried by water wherever it offers the best value-for-money solution in terms of the economy, society and the environment. The Government will do what they can to help a port such as Sharpness make the most of that potential.

However, I should make it clear that we believe that port operations and port developments should not rely on public subsidy. Port infrastructure can and should be commercially financed. Port subsidies not only have the potential to distort competition between ports but risk spreading the problems caused by excess capacity. Nevertheless, we undertake to judge each case on its merits, balancing the potential for adverse economic impact against the real social, economic and environmental benefits to be derived.

Although we have no plans to give British Waterways increased grant aid to enable it to expand its freight activities, infrastructure investment might be supported by freight facility grants to help divert traffic from our roads on to water. Start-up and catalyst funding might also be available from the European Commission's Marco Polo programme, which is the grant regime supporting modal shift away from roads.

British Waterways remains committed to keeping the port of Sharpness open and the prospects for further traffic growth are good, whether it be more traffic from the west midlands or more locally sourced waste and recyclables using the Gloucester and Sharpness canal. The Government as a whole are committed to taking traffic off the roads and to boosting short-sea shipping, all as part of a sustainable freight policy. That entails ensuring that the Government's ports policy continues to provide the right framework for the sustainable development of our ports, large and small.

I am sure that my hon. Friend will be delighted to hear that the Department for Transport will work with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and British Waterways to ensure that Sharpness has every opportunity to succeed within the ports policy framework. But, most importantly, we look to port operators such as Sharpness Dock Ltd to make the most of the potential, for the benefit of the port's customers, of the local area and the wider region that it serves.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Post Office Closures

1. Mr. David Heyes (Ashton-under-Lyne) (Lab): If she will make a statement on post office closures. [195860]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): Post Office Ltd. embarked on a restructuring of its urban network in late 2002 because there was simply no longer enough business to sustain the existing network. The urban reinvention programme will help to ensure a sustainable urban network for the future. The programme is now approaching its final stages, and 95 per cent. of people living in urban areas will still be within a mile of their nearest post office.

Mr. Heyes: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer, but I wish I could share her optimism about the way in which the post office closure programme is being handled, especially given the predicted threat to Crown offices. I do not believe that franchising is the answer. In the Failsworth area of my constituency, there is a former Crown office that was franchised to the Co-op some years ago. It is now threatened with closure, despite being described by the Post Office as > "a busy branch which attracts customers from a wide area".

This is happening simply because the Co-op has decided to get out of the post office business. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the time has come for a decisive ministerial intervention to bring some sanity to the Post Office's incompetent closure programme and to remind the Post Office of its public service obligation?

Ms Hewitt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that question, because it gives me the opportunity to stress to every hon. Member that the press coverage earlier this week was completely wrong. There is no proposal or programme to cut a swathe through the directly managed post offices. The only requirement that I have placed on Allan Leighton and his team at the Post Office is that they stop the losses in the directly managed post offices, which are currently amounting to some £71 million a year. That is simply unacceptable. There are 550 directly managed post offices. Fewer than five of them are likely to close next year, and that will be because they are simply not viable. Whether the others remain directly managed or whether some become managed through a retail franchise, as others have done in the past, the important issue is that they continue to give the best possible service to customers, and that they bring new customers in to all our post offices by introducing new products and services, as the Post Office is doing.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): I hear what the Secretary of State says, but, having gone through the post office reinvention programme, which closed many sub-post offices in towns and rural areas, we now hear that the Post Office is even considering closing Crown post offices, whose existence has often been given as the excuse for closing down sub-post offices. Does she not accept that there is a real need for the Government to intervene and get a handle on what is happening to the whole post office network?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman should understand that, because of what we have done on rural post offices, we have stopped all rural post office closures, except those that are completely unavoidable because nobody can be found to run the sub-post office in question. I understand very well why people are concerned about urban network closures, because we all value the part that sub-post offices play in our communities. However, we face a choice. Do we simply allow unplanned closures to take place as sub-postmasters retire or give up because they cannot make a living, or do we back our Post Office in a planned reorganisation of the network that will give better service to customers? I believe that we are taking the right approach. This is a planned reorganisation, there is more investment in the post offices and, contrary to the hon. Gentleman's assertion, there are no proposals to close all the directly managed post offices.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil) (Lab): My right hon. Friend might not yet have had time to read the document that my colleagues and I on the Select Committee on Trade and Industry have issued in response to her comments on our report on the urban reinvention programme. It is not without precedent, but it is not common for Select Committees to comment on a Minister's comments. We did so because we were so concerned by the inadequacy of the response that we received. In respect of implementation, transparency and consultation, the handling of the urban reinvention programme was a bit of a shambles. Frankly, we do not agree that it was effectively and efficiently handled, and we think that there is an unwarranted degree of complacency on the part of the Department.

What is more, we feel that the assessment of the effectiveness of urban reinvention is far too narrow, and the idea that it can be effectively and efficiently carried out only on the basis of the number of closures is not the best criterion to apply. This was the unanimous view of a cross-party Committee that, as I have said, took the rare step of questioning the effectiveness of the Government's response to our report. We would like to think that when the Secretary of State has had time to consider the document, a better response will be forthcoming.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I appeal to the House for brief questions and brief replies?

Ms Hewitt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the work that he and his fellow Committee members have undertaken. I will read his report very carefully. I have not had time to do so yet, because it was published only half an hour ago; but I have had an opportunity to read the last line of its conclusions, which states

> "Its true effectiveness"

—the effectiveness of urban reinvention, that is—

> "can only be assessed in terms of the future viability of the urban network."

I entirely endorse that. That is the goal of urban reinvention, and that is the basis on which we are judging the progress that has been made.

As for administration and consultation, following a number of expressions of concern from Members nearly a year ago, on 5 February my hon. Friend the Member for East Ham (Mr. Timms), then the Minister for postal services, announced significant improvements in the consultation process. Moreover, by means of that process Postwatch has ensured that nearly 400 closure proposals have been withdrawn or changed.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): How many more post offices are going to close?

Ms Hewitt: That will depend on the outcome of the consultation that is currently taking place in the constituencies that have not yet been part of the process, but I can say that the number is likely to be considerably smaller than the 3,500 figure that was bandied around by the press and Conservative Members some months ago.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend will know, I am a member of the Select Committee chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill). We see this as the urban destruction of the post office network. What worries me is the fact that we now have empty shops in Chorley. The appropriate criterion was not used, the figures were massaged, and the whole thing was an absolute disgrace. We were depending on the Crown post office in the town centre becoming a replacement for the benefit of those wishing to travel into town. Can we have a categorical assurance that the Crown post office will remain open, like others elsewhere?

Ms Hewitt: The directly managed Crown post offices are regarded as part of the urban network. They are therefore subject to exactly the same criterion as we set for the Post Office—that 95 per cent. of people living in urban areas must be within a mile of a post office. As for the specific issue of Chorley Crown post office, I will check with David Mills of Post Office Ltd. and write to my hon. Friend.

I cannot accept my hon. Friend's assertion about urban reinvention. I stress that whereas post offices were closing in an unplanned way because sub-postmasters and postmistresses simply could not make a living, there is now a new network. Nine out of 10 customers of post offices that have closed have moved their custom to the nearest branches, and thanks to the new products we are providing—particularly the new banking services—we are increasing the potential customer base. There are now 21 million people who can do their banking at the post office. That is the way in which to strengthen our post office network.

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle) (LD): What advice can the Secretary of State offer my elderly and disabled constituents, and those with mobility problems, who, as a result of the flawed network reinvention process, have either no access to a post office because they cannot reach the top of the hill where the only remaining post office is, or rather worse access?

Ms Hewitt: One of the main factors taken into account by Postwatch as well as the Post Office when they are considering the closure of a branch is access for elderly people, people with disabilities and people without the use of a car. As I have said, nine out of 10 customers of post offices that have closed have moved their custom to the nearest branches that Postwatch and Post Office Ltd. were considering. I sympathise with the hon. Lady's constituents who may be experiencing difficulties, but I am afraid I must advise them that the Liberal Democrats' policy—as announced by their Front-Bench spokesman—is to privatise the Post Office along the lines of the Dutch model. That would hardly improve matters.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): On access, will my right hon. Friend look at Greenacres post office in Aylesford, which is subject to closure, and the receiving post office that is about a mile away? Access to it will not be possible for people in wheelchairs, and the Post Office is suggesting that such people ring a bell outside, so that counter staff can deal with their requests on the pavement.

Ms Hewitt: I certainly understand my hon. Friend's concern about the position of his wheelchair-bound constituents. The Under-Secretary with responsibility postal services, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe), and I will ensure that we check exactly what the situation is, and whether it is possible, given the investment that we are putting into the post office network, to deal with the problem. I will write to my hon. Friend on this subject.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): But is the Secretary of State not slightly concerned that she has received no support from any Member in any part of the House? Does she not also accept the view of the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters, which represents 16,000 sub-post offices? It believes that the Government have caused much of the problem by reducing post offices' viability as a result of reducing their footfall. Has she bothered to read its manifesto, and if so, what is she going to adopt from it?

Ms Hewitt: Since becoming Secretary of State, I have stayed in very close touch with the federation, and indeed, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary met its representatives only last week. The federation itself has been calling for an urban reinvention programme—with compensation for sub-postmasters who have to give up their offices—precisely because so many of its members simply cannot make a living. The fact is that the traditional business of cashing of benefit books at post offices has been falling for years, as more and more people shift to banking, using the internet and so on. What we are doing, and which the hon. Gentleman's Government never did, is modernising and investing in our post offices, and ensuring—as the federation and others want—that there are new products, new services and new customers, and therefore a much healthier post office network in future.

Gas Prices

2. Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): What recent discussions she has had with Ofgem on fair competition in gas prices. [195861]

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): I have discussed gas market prices with Ofgem. It recently published a report that identified the cause of such rises as the impact on the UK wholesale market of the cost of gas in continental Europe—gas prices there are linked to oil prices, which have obviously risen—and of declining gas production in the North sea.

Huw Irranca-Davies: My hon. Friend will be aware of the considerable disquiet that exists among residential gas consumers at what seem to be runaway prices in the gas market. I attended a CBI dinner two weeks ago, at which the main topic of conversation was the impact of gas prices on the manufacturing base in south Wales. The manufacturing base in my constituency is very healthy and there are many jobs, but can my hon. Friend give me and employers in my constituency an assurance that gas prices will be brought under control, and that there will be genuine and fair competition in respect of them?

Mr. O'Brien: A recent report by Oxford Economic Research Associates, published in October, showed that the UK has the most competitive energy market in Europe. Prices are indeed increasing, but from a historically very low base in real terms. Domestic consumers can of course substantially reduce their gas bills by switching suppliers; indeed, a £30 reduction for gas and £20 for electricity is achievable. Customers who can switch their method of payment to direct debit can save up to £13 on their electricity bills and £14 to £26 on their gas bills, and some companies are offering low-cost—or, indeed, free—insulation to pensioners and those on benefit. The owner of a typical 1970s semi that is heated by gas could save up to £130 per annum by using proper insulation. On industrial prices, Ofgem is looking at the way in which the market is operating to ensure that it continues to do so efficiently.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Does the Minister acknowledge Ofgem's estimate that wholesale energy prices in the UK will rise this winter by £5 billion as a result of these increases, and that that will dramatically increase fuel poverty, hit households hard and undermine the competitiveness of British industry? The fact is that competitiveness within the UK market does not help if we are being undermined by a lack of competitiveness in the European market. Is it not time that the European Commission de-linked the coupling of gas and oil prices and introduced a genuinely competitive market? As things stand, we are exporting gas to the continent when prices are low, and importing it back again when prices are at a record high.

Mr. O'Brien: On the hon. Gentleman's final point, I certainly agree that we need to get the European Commission to ensure that there is a liberalisation of the energy market in Europe. The increase in oil prices is affecting gas prices, and there is a link to Europe, but if we can ensure a greater degree of liberalisation in the European energy market, we may be able to get some of those prices under more effective control.

We view the energy sector here as market-based and it has functioned remarkably well in recent years. As I said, domestic customers can reduce their gas bills through energy insulation methods, by switching suppliers and, if they can, by direct debit payment. Those are means by which domestic consumers can make substantial savings on their bills. Ofgem has looked at the way in which the market is operating for industrial customers. It is conducting further investigations into particular issues such as the excessive spike in some prices and will get back to us on that. We are monitoring the issue carefully. It is important and the hon. Gentleman can be sure that the Government take the matter seriously.

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale) (Lab): May I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the impact of gas prices on INEOS Chlor in Runcorn? The gas price per therm has gone up from 17p to 34p—double the price paid last year, which is costing the firm £170,000 a day extra, £50 million a year more. It has to pay 25 per cent. more for its gas, yet it comes from the same fields that supply continental Europe. What are the Government going to do about it?

Mr. O'Brien: Ofgem has studied with a great deal of care the way in which the gas market operates and it concluded that wholesale price increases have caused the increases in domestic prices. A number of gas companies have taken the view that they will hold their prices; others that they will increase their prices to their customers. In those circumstances, customers will want to look for companies that will cost them less and consider switching to them to receive lower bills. What we want to do is encourage customers to examine their bills, check with Energywatch to find out who is charging the lowest prices and, where they can, switch. They should also take the other measures that I mentioned, which will also ensure that their bills come down.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): Will the Minister accept that consumers will take with a pinch of salt the idea that savings can be made by switching accounts? When the price of gas fell by nearly half, consumer prices fell by only 10 per cent. The truth of the matter is that when gas prices go up, the consumers take the burden, but when gas prices go down, they do not gain the benefit.

Mr. O'Brien: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that we should dispense with the market and somehow introduce regulation. That would be a volte-face for the Conservatives. As far as we are concerned, the consumer has a number of options available. Different consumers will have different available options. It is certainly the case that, on average, switching supplier can save £30 on a gas bill per year, and by switching payment to direct debit a further £26 could be saved on gas bills. Furthermore, if consumers properly insulate, they could save £130 per annum. Some of the companies increasing their prices are making it clear that they will offer some of the insulation free of charge. I might add that replacing an old boiler with a modern, energy-saving one—I accept that it is a capital cost—could bring about savings of up to £120 per annum. Those are quite significant savings that consumers could make, but none of that disputes the fact that the issue is serious and that we are watching the market with a great deal of care.

Inward Investment

3. Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): What action is being taken by UK Trade and Investment to promote inward investment in the UK. [195862]

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Douglas Alexander): UK Trade and Investment has 39 inward investment teams in 19 countries striving to bring investment here to the United Kingdom. UKTI, the regional development agencies and the devolved Administrations work hard to turn those proposals into reality. The priority is to bring in knowledge-driven investments. Under the terms of the 2004 spending review, UKTI will expand its operation over the next three years in order to maintain the UK's position as the No. 1 location in Europe for attracting inward investment and to increase the quantity and quality of investment into the UK.

Mr. Challen: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer which, combined with the recent improvements in the manufacturing sector, demonstrates that Britain is working. However, I want to add the caveat that I am very concerned about regional disparities. The overheating in the south-eastern economy means that areas such as Yorkshire and the Humber could miss out on inward investments and improvements in manufacturing. In his evidence last week to the Environmental Audit Committee, Sir John Egan gave the impression that success should be encouraged to breed success in successful areas, and that we should almost forget the rest. What are the Government doing to counterbalance that sort of approach?

Mr. Alexander: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that matter. The Government are determined to ensure regionally balanced economic growth right across the UK. That is why, in my hon. Friend's area, Yorkshire Forward is progressing the agenda of bringing inward investment directly into Yorkshire and Humberside. The Government have put in place a platform of stability, and we want that to be the basis for regional devolution. In turn, that can be a real driver for the economic generation of every part of this country.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim) (UUP): Thousands of jobs have been lost in Belfast, in heavy engineering, shipbuilding and the manufacture of textile machinery, and they have not been replaced. There is great disappointment in Protestant areas, and people feel that more has been lost than gained since the Belfast agreement was signed. Will the Secretary of State and the Minister use their influence to persuade potential investors in the UK that Belfast is a good place to locate? There has always been a good work ethic there, and education and training services are excellent. Will the Government encourage investors to work with the development agencies in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Alexander: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. One of the elements of the Government's approach to Northern Ireland is that we are determined to secure the economic regeneration of areas that have suffered the de-industrialisation that he describes. I have great sympathy with that, not least because the area that I represent suffered similar de-industrialisation when jobs in the traditional manufacturing and shipbuilding sectors were lost in recent years. The latest figures available to me show that, in 2003–04, 26 inward investment successes were enjoyed by the Northern Ireland Office. I shall be happy to communicate that information to the hon. Gentleman directly. At the same time, I shall make colleagues in Government aware of the matters that he has raised in respect of the ongoing challenge in Northern Ireland.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): May I take this opportunity to inform my hon. Friend of the great successes achieved in my constituency in attracting foreign inward investments? Before 1997, there were no foreign inward investors there, but now we have Merloni, an Italian company, TRB, a Japanese company, and Pachem, an Austrian company. What steps can be taken to increase the co-operation between the Department, the Welsh Development Agency and the National Assembly for Wales to ensure that further foreign inward investment takes place, in my constituency and in Wales as a whole?

Mr. Alexander: I join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to the work undertaken by the WDA, which has combined with the work done by the Government to advance the sort of inward investment that he describes. One of the challenges for UKTI is to balance the strategic overview available at the centre with the regional reach of agencies such as the WDA. We need to strike a balance between ensuring that we speak with a common voice to the inward investment community around the world—and we should emphasise Britain's competitiveness without shame or embarrassment—and ensuring that we speak up for those parts of the economy that may not, traditionally, have received as much inward investment as other areas. That is why I believe that the regional focus of directly involving the RDAs strikes exactly the right balance between strength at the centre and real regional reach.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): In June, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development issued a report stating that the foreign direct investment flows into the UK fell by almost half in 2003, from a level that was unimpressive by historical standards. Was the OECD wrong? Will the Minister give a slightly better reply than the Secretary of State did when she said, in the previous DTI question session, that the OECD was using the wrong statistics?

Mr. Alexander: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that characteristically gracious question. There is of course a technical distinction to be drawn between stock and flows of inward investment, and I would be happy to write to him on the technical point that underpinned the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. However, it ill behoves the Opposition to lecture this Government on the success of inward investment, when Ernst and Young, in a recent report, declared that the UK remains the No. 1 location in Europe for inward investment. The anti-European policies of the Conservatives would imperil that leadership position.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend explain who has a watching brief on the effect of inward investment? I know that we have a good success story, but I put to him the case of a marvellous investment in the purchase of a company, with promises of expansion and technological development, followed—a couple of years later—by the shift of most production overseas, with the consequent suffering by suppliers. Has that investment had a negative or positive impact?

Mr. Alexander: My hon. Friend raises an important point, which has exercised the Government for several years. We need to ensure that we get best value for money for any public support that is provided for inward investment. Our response is not to turn away inward investment, but to ensure that support is provided to our own indigenous manufacturing base and British companies. That is why we have advanced the research and development tax credit and put in place regional economic development strategies from a foundation of economic strength. We need to ensure that, as well as attracting inward investment, we ensure that we get value for money for it and that we support indigenous British companies.

EU Constitution

5. Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): What assessment she has made of the impact that an EU constitution will have on the number of EU directives affecting UK industry. [195864]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The constitution will have no impact on existing directives. As far as future directives are concerned, the constitution will strengthen the position of national Governments and Parliaments.

Alistair Burt: Is it not the case that because of the uncertain relationship between the decisions of the European courts and the constitution there is no credibility in what the Secretary of State says? Because of that lack of credibility and the Government's track record of an increase in regulation of more than 50 per cent., it is no wonder that in a recent poll of 1,000 chief executives about the impact of the European constitution, 59 per cent. said that it will be bad for business. Some 64 per cent. of members of the CBI also say that it will be bad for business. Is it not that track record and the failure to address regulation that make businesses in my constituency and elsewhere think that the Government are all talk on deregulation?

Ms Hewitt: Let me give the hon. Gentleman just one example of the many actions we have taken to improve the climate for business people in Britain—leaving aside the enormous achievement of economic stability. Twelve years ago, the then Prime Minister told the Conservative party conference that "you may need 28 separate licences, certificates and registrations just to start a business".

Now, thanks to our Government, people can set up a business with one form in less than a day for £25. Every global benchmarking survey shows that we are one of the best countries in the world in which to set up and grow a business. We are determined to go on improving that by continuing to simplify and improve regulation. The new constitution will strengthen our hand, just as the new Commission will, in achieving better regulation and economic reform in Europe.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend attack even more vigorously the mealy-mouthed nonsense from the Opposition? Our future prosperity lies with Europe, but the Opposition constantly deride Europe and directives that have improved our environment and the lives of people in this country. Let us go on the attack and tell people the truth about our EU membership.

Ms Hewitt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity and I am delighted to take it. The consequence of the Conservative position on the constitution—and the intention of many Conservative Members—would be to sideline the UK within Europe, to put us at the margins or even on the road to withdrawal. That would put us in the same position as Norway and Norwegian businesses, which have to comply with European directives but have no say in what they contain. I remind Conservative Members of how the new constitution—on which we secured all our goals—is viewed in the rest of Europe. As Le Monde correctly said in June:

"Whatever people say"—

it must have had the Conservatives in mind—

"this text remains a British victory."

It will be good for Europe and good for Britain.

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the Secretary of State that I must get through the business on the Order Paper, and I need some help?

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): According to the Treasury, about 50 per cent. of all regulations with a significant impact on business derive from the EU. Does the Secretary of State agree with the Chancellor, her colleague, who now believes that the level of regulation coming from the EU is "unacceptable"? Does she think that EU regulation will increase or decrease in the light of the Labour Government signing up to the European constitution?

Ms Hewitt: I always agree with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, and it is because we are so determined to get better regulations in Europe that we support the constitution and economic reform. We have won the argument across all European member states that we need simpler, better regulation, and we have got a programme of work to deliver that.

Mr. O'Brien: The Prime Minister's former chief economic adviser—a man whose advice the Prime Minister told us last week he always took seriously—recently lamented the fact that the EU constitution

"entrenches and expands the . . . European social model."

Under Labour, the UK has plummeted from 13th in 1997 to 30th place this year in global rankings of the burden of Government regulation. Will the Secretary of State now look those in British business in the eye and tell them when her addiction to signing up to more EU regulations made British business more competitive?

Ms Hewitt: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) recently said that the UK is one of the best places in the world to do business. That is indeed true, and we will go on simplifying and improving regulation, both domestically and in Europe, but unlike the Conservative party we recognise the enormous benefits to the British people that come from our membership of the EU, including—to name just a few—cleaner beaches, cheaper telephones and cheaper holidays.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): Is it not correct to say that the UK has less labour market and product regulation than any other country in the OECD and that it has greater labour utilisation than most other countries in the EU and is only behind Japan and America? What discussions has my right hon. Friend had with the TUC regarding security in a flexible market?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. The UK has the best economic record of all the G7 countries for growth, economic stability and, crucially, employment. I draw the House's attention to the recent World Bank study of 145 countries that placed the UK top in the EU, with the best business conditions, because the UK regulates in less costly and burdensome ways than other countries.

Economic Partnership Agreements

6. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): If she will make a statement on the development of economic partnership agreements between the European Union and poor countries. [195865]

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Douglas Alexander): Negotiations of economic partnership agreements between the EU and the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries were launched earlier this year. Substantive negotiations are due to start early in the new year and to be concluded by the end of 2007. While the negotiations are at a very early stage, we will continue to work with the European Commission, other member states and ACP countries to ensure that those agreements deliver their development potential.

Mr. Carmichael: I thank the Minister for that answer. He will be aware of the fears expressed by Christian Aid, among others, that economic partnership agreements will force ACP countries to open their markets to unequal competition with the EU. Indeed, the Commission's own impact assessment of EPAs concludes that they could threaten the development of a modern industrial sector and result in social instability in some of the world's poorest countries. What will the Government do to ensure that the needs of poor people in developing countries are put first and not overridden by a trade liberalisation agenda?

Mr. Alexander: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern and commitment on these issues, and I look forward to discussing them at Christian Aid's national Scottish conference this Saturday.

On the specific issue that the hon. Gentleman raises, I emphasise that we are at a very early stage in the negotiations, but I wish to make two brief points. First, under the current system of trade preferences, such agreements are not compatible with World Trade Organisation rules, so change must occur. Secondly, I emphasise that the reciprocity that we are obliged to consider as part of those agreements is not the same as a symmetric opening, and in that sense developing countries have far more time to open markets than is suggested by the expectation about when the EU would open them—but, as I say, the negotiations continue.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that in the interests of policy coherence it is important to couple the EU's economic partnership agreements with reform of the common agricultural policy, because unless we reduce subsidies on our domestic agriculture and, most importantly, remove export subsidies, the products that the poorest countries are most able to export will still be unable to enter our markets?

Mr. Alexander: I am in full agreement with my hon. Friend. He can look back to the success that we enjoyed at Geneva in July when we achieved a framework for the Doha development agreement, contrary to the pessimism expressed after Cancun. One of the keys that unlocked that agreement was the EU's movement on export subsidies. The challenge now is to achieve the parallelism that was contingent on the agreement—we need a similar response from the United States, and clearly the new trade commissioner will take that forward. If there is scope for further progress, we are determined to be at the forefront.

Post Office Closures

7. Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): What discussions she has had with the Deputy Prime Minister on the impact of the closure of sub-post offices on neighbourhood renewal areas; and if she will make a statement. [195866]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): There have been no specific discussions on this matter, but the Department has worked closely with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister in developing the £15 million deprived urban post office fund, which is aimed at providing support for sub-post offices in the most deprived urban areas. Post office closures are a commercial matter for Post Office Ltd. It is the company's responsibility when developing its closure proposals to consider carefully, among a range of factors, any impact that they may have on neighbourhood renewal areas.

Clive Efford: I appreciate that the closures are a matter for Post Office Ltd. The criterion it has set to identify deprivation uses ward-based statistics, which, the Government realise, are a blunt instrument. They have introduced neighbourhood renewal projects in some areas because they understand that the figures do not identify areas of deprivation in sufficient detail, but Post Office Ltd. has ignored that fact in its reinvention programme. Will my hon. Friend take that up with Post Office Ltd. and revisit some of its proposals? It should ensure that there is a good case for the closure of post offices in neighbourhood renewal areas. The sub-postmaster of the Mound post office in my constituency has changed his mind. He no longer wants to close it because he thinks that he can put a business together, but still the closure is going ahead.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue and pay tribute to his work on the matter in his constituency. He has written to me on the subject and I shall respond in due course. He can take a crumb of comfort from the fact that Postwatch will launch a survey on the impact of post office closures to determine whether the company got things right, so there is an immediate proposal to examine his constituency issue. In the longer term, we will see how effective the closures have been and act accordingly.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I support the views expressed by the hon. Member for Eltham (Clive Efford) and I would like to go further. Does the Minister not accept that the Post Office has forgotten the service responsibilities that it owes to people in communities throughout the country? Will he have a firm word to encourage it to understand that the location of post offices in areas such as those that the hon. Gentleman described is vital to their success? The Post Office has become too damn commercial and has forgotten its duty of service and provision of service to the people of this country.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman raises, but he must remember the bigger picture affecting the Post Office, which has been missed in today's questions. Closures happened regularly under the Conservative Government without any control or consideration of the reaction to them. This Government have invested £2 billion in the Royal Mail and post office network, but I agree that we need to get the balance right, which is why my hon. Friend the Member for East Ham (Mr. Timms) talked to Postwatch about the consultation process when he was a Minister in the Department. I accept that we need to learn lessons, but we must also remember that post office business was losing millions of pounds every day. The Government have put in the investment and we will continue to ensure that people get the service that they require.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): We accept the need for some change, but my constituents feel that the seven planned closures in the Leigh area go way too far. Leigh is a former mining area and has a legacy of ill health, including people with mobility problems. It is a collection of former mining villages and some of our post offices are classed as rural. May I urge my hon. Friend to impress on the Post Office the need to proceed with great caution in a constituency such as Leigh when implementing a closure programme?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I recognise those points and am pleased that my hon. Friend accepts that change was necessary. If no change had taken place, there would be no post offices and we would be in a dire situation. The Government recognise the value of post offices. We also recognise the value of having a controlled position, which is why investment has been made. We set up the consultation process through Postwatch, and I know that my hon. Friend will have contacted it about the closures. If he feels that the process has not worked properly, I shall certainly take representations from him.

Operating and Financial Review Regulations

8. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): What key performance indicators will be included in the operating and financial review regulations. [195867]

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Jacqui Smith): Our proposals for a statutory operating and financial review will require quoted companies to provide a narrative report setting out the company's business objectives, its strategy for achieving them, and the risk and uncertainties that might affect their achievement. It will require companies to report on other matters where these are necessary for an understanding of the business, and these include their employees, the environment, and social and community issues.

Tom Brake: I thank the Minister for her response. Will there be a mandatory set of performance indicators for quoted companies, covering their environmental and social performance and impact? If so, will the performance indicators allow comparisons between different companies? Will they also allow a year-on-year assessment of the companies?

Jacqui Smith: There will not be a mandatory set of common key performance indicators. What is important about the process is that directors have to think carefully about the prospects of their business and how different factors—the environment, their employees or other risks—will impact on their business. They then have to consider the most appropriate ways to measure that and to report it to shareholders and investors who, because of that process, will be better able to engage with the ongoing governance and running of the company. I am not convinced that setting out a list that directors may be tempted to run down and tick is the most appropriate way to encourage the engagement that this development is all about.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Given that the operating and financial review regulations are designed to make directors more accountable and that the Government have spent a small fortune on introducing, through resource accounting, often ill-fitting copies of private sector accounting practice into the public sector, do they intend to produce something similar for the public sector so that we have greater insight into its increasingly opaque accounts?

Jacqui Smith: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman's conclusion, but I agree that we must consider applying the same principles on transparency as we propose for the private sector to the public sector. In many ways, we lead on that in terms of the information we provide. It is key that we improve that information and enable accountability wherever possible.

Young Workers

9. Tony Lloyd (Manchester Central) (Lab): If she will make a statement on her policy on protection against exploitation of young workers. [195868]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I understand that my hon. Friend is particularly interested in the position of young apprentices.

The Low Pay Commission looked at the position of apprentices aged 16 and 17 in its 2004 report and recommended that they should be exempt from the minimum wage because of concerns that employers might otherwise be deterred from providing valuable training opportunities for young people. Bearing in mind the Government's ambition to ensure that young people reach 19 with the skills they need to succeed, the Government accepted the commission's recommendation.

Tony Lloyd: My hon. Friend needs no lessons from me as he has a strong record on protecting all workers, and in particular young workers, and the Government have done much in that area. However, unscrupulous employers can make life difficult for people on modern apprenticeships. The £79 recommendation, accepted by many, is designed to ensure that employers take on apprentices. Some employers, alas, are driving the figure below the recommendation. Not only are they exploiting young workers, but they are giving them a strong incentive to get out of training and to work for Tesco or wherever the minimum wage applies. That is not the right way to go.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Again, I acknowledge the work that my hon. Friend has done to pursue employment rights for workers in the UK. He makes a valid point. The Learning and Skills Council, which is under the auspices of the Department for Education and Skills, deals with issues relating to apprentices. We are considering the matter of the £79 and the protections that should be included in the contracts between apprentices and companies. My hon. Friend will be pleased about the number of modern apprenticeships taken forward under the Government's policies, and he will recognise that we always try to strike a balance between making sure that people are employable and making sure they get a just reward from their work.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

The Minister was asked—

Women Scientists

19. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): If she will meet the chairman and chief executive of the Engineering and Technology Board to discuss career opportunities for women in science, engineering and technology; and if she will make a statement. [195879]

The Deputy Minister for Women and Equality (Jacqui Smith): I welcome the support that the Engineering and Technology Board has put behind our strategy to increase the number of girls and women taking up careers in science, engineering and technology, and I am pleased that my noble Friend the Minister for Science and Innovation frequently meets Sir Peter Williams and Alan Clark, the chair and the chief executive of the ETB respectively, to discuss all matters concerning the board, including career opportunities for women in science, engineering and technology. Their next meeting is in November and would be a perfect opportunity to discuss the matter further.

Michael Fabricant: I thank the right hon. Lady for that constructive answer. She recognises the problem of skills in IT, particularly with young recruits. Gartner Consulting and e-skills UK reckon that 179,000 graduates are needed each year, but only 18,000 students have gone in this year—only a small proportion. Worse than that, only 20 per cent. of those in the IT industry are women. What can the Government do to encourage more women to go into IT?

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point by identifying the link between areas in which we need to encourage more women and areas where there are skills shortages. The first step is to make the argument clearly that where talented people are needed, they must be recruited from the whole population, not from only part of it. Through the work that we are supporting with the UK Resource Centre on science, engineering and technology, which is working with employers, kitemarking good employers and providing good practice advice among many other things, we will be able to make progress. My colleagues in the Department for Education and Skills and in the education system more widely are looking at careers advice and how we can encourage more girls and young women to do technology subjects, particularly information technology, and to carry on to get the benefits of working in those areas.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton) (Lab): During her discussions, will my right hon. Friend meet an organisation called WISE—Women Into Science and Engineering? Women play a significant role in all types of engineering and should play a greater role on the craft side of engineering and science. Will she do her utmost to encourage women to take up positions in new modern apprenticeships that deal with craft issues?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend is right. I join him in commending the work of WISE, which is supported by the Department. It does an excellent job. He is also right that there are already some excellent women working in engineering. We as employers and Government need to do more to make sure that we encourage that. This week I was pleased to visit the British Gas Engineering Academy in Leeds, where I met young women who are undertaking apprenticeships and training in gas engineering. They certainly thought it was a good job, and I was pleased that British Gas was making such an effort to recruit those young women, to their benefit and to the benefit of the business.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I am delighted to hear that the Minister needs no encouragement to encourage women in that direction, but she will be aware of her Department's research that found that women with science, engineering and technology degrees were economically less active than their male counterparts or female non-SET graduates. There is a particular problem when women have had a career break, which makes it difficult for them to return. What is the Minister doing to address these problems?

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Lady is right. That is why one of the programmes of work of the UK Resource Centre, backed up by investment of £1.5 million from the Department for Education and Skills, aims to examine the issues relating to women returners—for example, helping them to keep up to date with scientific research during their career break, helping to train them when they come back into employment, and giving good practice advice to employers about how to bring women back into the workplace and keep them engaged. There is both money and action through the UK Resource Centre aimed at the issue that the hon. Lady identified.

Women Non-executive Directors

20. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): What progress has been made in increasing the proportion of women non-executive directors. [195880]

The Minister for Women and Equality (Ms Patricia Hewitt): In 2000, only 57 FTSE 100 non-executive directorships were held by women. That increased in 2003 to 84, but it is still not good enough, which is why we are working with business leaders, recruitment firms and others to widen board recruitment.

Dr. Cable: How does the Minister explain the fact that whereas women make up 30 per cent. of all company managers, her own figures suggest that they account for only 6 per cent. of the magic circle of non-executive directors, and only 1 per cent. of chairmanships? What is the Laura Tyson initiative, which I think the right hon. Lady launched, helping concretely to deliver in this respect?

Ms Hewitt: A real problem that was clearly identified in Derek Higgs's report is that of non-executive directorships being recruited from far too narrow a pool of people who are already known to the existing board members, and particularly the chair. Since the Higgs and Tyson reports, we have held round tables with a series of leading businesses, remuneration committees, headhunters, search firms and so on; we are now working on a document entitled "Better Boards" that will be launched later this month, drawing on the business case for widening and diversifying board appointments; and, crucially, we have established a mentoring scheme with 20 chairs and chief executives of the FTSE 100 already signed up to act as mentors to women who are one or two steps below a board-level appointment, but who with the right support will form part of the next generation.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): Does the Minister agree that it is somewhat ironic that only 6 per cent. of non-executive directors are women when a non-executive directorship is the perfect job for a woman? We are always talking about flexibility and part-time employment, and that is exactly what a non-executive directorship is. I am pleased to hear what the Minister has said about the "Better Boards" report, and I look forward to seeing it. I find myself strangely in agreement with most of what she has just said, but please will she assure me that she will not go down the road of introducing quotas or coercing companies into employing women? It should not be necessary. The business case itself should convince all companies that the best companies are already employing best practice with regard to women, and I hope that she will continue encouraging and not coercing.

Ms Hewitt: I entirely agree with the point made by the hon. Lady, and I can happily give her that assurance. We have no intention whatever of imposing Norwegian-style quotas on boards, but I cannot help reflecting that it is rather a pity that the Conservative party proposes to slash through my Department's budget, and the Liberal Democrats propose to abolish it completely, so no one would be left to pursue the excellent work that she has just welcomed.

Women Chartered Engineers

21. Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): What assessment she has made of the effectiveness of programmes designed to enable a greater number of women to become chartered engineers. [195881]

The Deputy Minister for Women and Equality (Jacqui Smith): As I said earlier, a large number of programmes are designed to encourage more women and girls to take up education and employment opportunities in engineering, stay in those careers and progress to the top of them. However, it remains the case that the percentage of female applicants and acceptances through the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service for engineering courses has remained stable at only 14 per cent. during the past 10 years. My officials are discussing with the new UK Resource Centre for women in science, engineering and technology the possibility of conducting a piece of research designed to map and evaluate these programmes, and will ensure that any best practice is subsequently shared.

Mr. McWalter: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer, but earlier she mentioned Alan Clark of the Engineering and Technology Board, and at a recent meeting with him I suggested that possibly the greatest single measure that could be taken would be for there to be zero fees for engineering students with proper Government funding for engineering places, so that the subject would be regarded as of national strategic importance, and so that women would be able to get the skills that would get them to the top of the boards of industry. I hope that my right hon. Friend will make representations to her colleagues at the Department for Education and Skills with a view to seeing whether really effective action in this matter might some day be taken.

Jacqui Smith: I agree with my hon. Friend's objectives, but I am not sure whether I agree with his proposals. It is important to encourage girls and young women to be interested in science and engineering at an earlier stage, which will increase applications, and to find ways post-higher education to keep people in the science, engineering and technology professions. It is, of course, viable for those companies that depend on engineers to consider ways to help student engineers with their fees, which employers in other industries sometimes do. We have a comprehensive range of activity to get young people, and particularly young women, interested in science, engineering and technology, to get them into university and to keep them in those professions afterwards. We are spending a significant amount of money and are focusing it in the right place.

Business of the House

12.30 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House please give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 8 NOVEMBER—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Housing Bill.

TUESDAY 9 NOVEMBER—Remaining stages of the Civil Partnership Bill [Lords], followed, if necessary, by consideration of Lords amendments.

WEDNESDAY 10 NOVEMBER—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Human Tissue Bill, followed, if necessary, by consideration of Lords amendments.

THURSDAY 11 NOVEMBER—Opposition half-day [unallotted]. There will be a half-day debate entitled "Government's Failure to Support Family Doctor Services" on an Opposition motion, followed, if necessary, by consideration of Lords amendments.

FRIDAY 12 NOVEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will include:

MONDAY 15 NOVEMBER—Consideration of Lords amendments.

TUESDAY 16 NOVEMBER—Consideration of Lords amendments.

WEDNESDAY 17 NOVEMBER—Consideration of Lords amendments.

THURSDAY 18 NOVEMBER—Consideration of Lords amendments.

I inform the House that business in Westminster Hall on Thursday 18 November will be:

THURSDAY 18 NOVEMBER—A debate on the report from the Work and Pensions Committee on the work of the Health and Safety Commission and Executive.

In respect of Prorogation, I hope that it will be possible to prorogue no later than Thursday 18 November. The House will understand that that is subject to the progress of business in both Houses.

Mr. Heald: I thank the Leader of the House for the business, although I must say that it seemed a tad repetitive.

When can we expect the pre-Budget statement? We normally have news of it by now. Will it even occur in November? Where is the draft Civil Service Bill, which has been promised for almost a year?

Turning to the situation in Northern Ireland, the Prime Minister said before the Leeds castle meeting in September that the moment of decision could not drag on indefinitely. Today's third report by the Independent Monitoring Commission makes bleak reading: paramilitaries have not wound down their activities, violence is at disturbingly high levels and a policy stalemate has been reached. Can we expect a statement before Prorogation setting out the Government's intentions for the future of government in Northern Ireland and do the Government have a plan B?

May we have a debate on the mid-term review of the common agricultural policy and the details of the single farm payment, which is causing farmers confusion? Farmers are planting their crops, to which those rules will apply, but the Government have not yet introduced the necessary rules, which would be extremely helpful to clarify the situation.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister said that he would give local authorities greater powers to ensure that they can take immediate action in the courts to deal with Travellers who flout planning laws. He also said that he is re-examining the matter to ensure that the powers are adequate. Can we have a debate about the planning process and Traveller sites? Planning permission is being obtained under the Human Rights Act 1998 for greenfield sites that no one else would be allowed to develop. Although the Government's proposals seem to allow stop notices to force any building work to stop, is it not the case that so far nothing has been done to address those difficult planning issues?

Yesterday, I raised again with the Leader of the House the question of Government co-operation with requests from Select Committees for witnesses and papers. Is he able to say that the Government are taking a new, more positive approach to this issue?

Finally, the Leader of the House will be aware of the concerns that have recently been expressed in the House about the protection of those who work for businesses that are subject to animal rights campaigns. Those campaigns now target shareholders and workers in associated businesses, including building companies and suppliers. There are still difficulties in relation to the approach of the Department of Trade and Industry to the privacy of shareholders registers and concerns that police powers may not be adequate. Would it be possible to have a joint Home Office-DTI debate in Government time on that subject?

Mr. Hain: That latter point is very important, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising it. Unfortunately, an official from the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency—who has since been prosecuted—divulged the names of individuals working on research to animal rights activists, allowing them to target and terrorise those individuals. That must be clamped down on.

On the pre-Budget statement, we will be able to give notice of that as soon as we are ready to do so.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that the draft Civil Service Bill will be published by the end of the Session.

I understand the points that the hon. Gentleman makes about the Northern Ireland report's findings, including the reduction in some paramilitary activity. That underlines our view that there must be a complete stop to all such activity, including organised crime. As for a plan B, we do not want to get into plan As or plan Bs—we want to get the Assembly back up and running and a proper peace agreement. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, working closely with the Prime Minister, is trying to ensure that that happens. As soon as there is any news, the House will be informed.

On the mid-term review, the hon. Gentleman knows that we have led the way across the rest of Europe for reform of the common agricultural policy. It is absorbing far too much of the European budget and is a waste of money. We have already achieved major reforms and will continue to drive that process forward.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's point about Travellers flouting planning laws. We are all concerned about that and it has been persistently raised on the Floor of the House. We are taking forward action on that front.

On information and documents for Select Committees, I gave evidence to the Liaison Committee in which I said that there should be a presumption that such documents should be made available on request and that officials, including special advisers, should appear before Select Committees. That does not mean, however, that such requests will be agreed to. There is a presumption in favour of openness, but in the end the decision rests with the Minister because of ministerial accountability—we are accountable to this House. That is a much more positive approach to the whole matter than has been evident until now.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North) (Lab): At yesterday's Prime Minister's Question Time, the Leader of the Opposition made a disgraceful accusation against a Department for Culture, Media and Sport civil servant, whom he virtually accused of engaging in what could amount to corrupt activities. May we have a debate about how we handle such matters in this Chamber, because although we can stand up and defend ourselves in here and in the media, civil servants cannot?

Mr. Hain: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you agree that it is important always to maintain high standards across the Floor in debate and in questions. I can only agree with my hon. Friend that there has been a severe deterioration of standards in the questions that are being asked, particularly by the Leader of the Opposition. We have seen a deliberate attempt to smear a civil servant that has frankly become all too typical, and was repeated by the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale). Last night, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport wrote to the Leader of the Opposition, flatly denying both reports and his claim, and making the point that casinos are subject to money-laundering regulations. Tough questions are fine but the sooner we get back to questions of high integrity the better.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): In the aftermath of the United States presidential election, the Prime Minister has given new impetus to the middle east peace process. Yet there are mixed messages from Washington. Those from Vice-President Cheney are much more aggressive than those from President Bush. May we have a full debate as soon as possible specifically on the middle east peace process, and not simply discuss it as part of a general foreign affairs debate? The matter is clearly urgent, as the Prime Minister said.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister make a statement on fire and rescue control centres? Dubious financial savings are said to be involved. Fire chiefs throughout the country doubt the merits of the proposal. Although they are prepared to answer parliamentary questions, the Deputy Prime Minister and his Ministers refuse to discuss the implications of the proposals with Members of Parliament from all over England, despite the requirement for consultation under part 1 section 2(5) of the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004. I presume that Members of Parliament are considered appropriate consultees.

Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that the former leader of Neath-Port Talbot council, Councillor Noel Crowley said:

> "A single Fire Control Centre covering the whole of Wales is not the best way to deliver an effective service. In an emergency, when a member of the public rings the Fire Service it would be much more appropriate if the person responding had the benefit of local knowledge. This would avoid confusion and lead to a speedier response. It could mean lives being saved."?

Why should lives be saved in Wales but not in England? Surely we can accept that what is good for Wales should be good for England.

The Leader of the House has previously said that he is sympathetic to a debate in Westminster Hall on the important House of Commons Commission report. When can that be timetabled?

Mr. Hain: I shall consider the latter point as soon as I can. I agreed with the hon. Gentleman when he asked me about it recently. It is a great opportunity to examine the excellent report from the House of Commons Commission. It should prove an interesting debate and we shall arrange it as soon as possible.

I am glad that the hon. Gentleman asked about the middle east peace process because the Prime Minister confirmed only yesterday that he is giving progress on it absolute priority. It is important in its own right to reverse the historic injustice done to the Palestinians and ensure that they have an independent state and, at the same time, ensure a secure Israeli state, living in partnership alongside the new independent Palestinian state. The Prime Minister is confident that we can make progress on that now that the American elections are out of the way.

I cannot believe that the Deputy Prime Minister, who is extremely accountable to the House and, almost more than any other Cabinet Minister, makes himself available around the House, flatly refuses to discuss fire and rescue control centres with hon. Members. However, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will have noted the hon. Gentleman's comments.

The hon. Gentleman referred to Noel Crowley, the former leader of my local council, who made some points and whose views are greatly respected. It does not automatically follow that what is done in Wales should be done in England. The purpose of devolution is to effect policies and models that are relevant to the different conditions in each part of the United Kingdom. We can learn from best practice. Indeed, perhaps in the case that the hon. Gentleman raised, there is some learning to do. However, in Wales there is learning to do about, for example, much shorter waiting lists in the health service in England.

Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): The hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) said that we had waited a year or so for the Civil Service Bill. In fact, we have been waiting for approximately 150 years. When we get one in the next week or so, will the Government draw attention to its constitutional significance through an oral statement? In introducing the measure, will they state the procedure whereby they intend Parliament to take it forward?

Mr. Hain: There are no plans for an oral statement. A consultation document will be published in which the draft Bill will appear. I know that my hon. Friend's Committee has taken an active interest in this matter and will no doubt continue to do so.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): When will the Secretary of State for Health present his public health White Paper to Parliament, and can we thereafter have a full day's debate in Government time so that Members on both sides of the House can urge the Government to take a robust approach to smoking in public places?

Mr. Hain: I think that the right hon. Gentleman will be encouraged on that matter by the forthcoming public health White Paper. On the timing, it will be quite soon.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): Can the Leader of the House arrange for another debate on Zimbabwe before the England cricket team leave, particularly in relation to early-day motion 1855, which draws attention to the expulsion from Zimbabwe of COSATU, the Congress of South African Trade Unions, and particularly the treatment of a fellow parliamentarian, Roy Bennett—who has visited this place quite recently—who has now been sentenced to 15 months' hard labour and is out breaking stones in Harare prison at this very time?

[That this House deplores as an insult to the international trade union movement and an affront to the principle of free association the recent deportation from Zimbabwe of a COSATU delegation; condemns the sentencing by the Zimbabwean Parliament of Roy Bennett, Member of Parliament for Chimanimani to 15 months' imprisonment with hard labour; regards the penalty as grossly disproportionate and the culmination of a sustained campaign of hate and personal abuse waged by Zanu PF ministers and the state-controlled propaganda machine against a culturally-sensitive and progressive elected representative of the people; and calls upon the governments and parliamentarians of member states to uphold Southern African Development Community Treaty principles of human rights, democracy and the rule of law in Zimbabwe.]

I know the views of the Leader of the House on this matter, but can he say whether there is any chance of another debate on Zimbabwe soon?

Mr. Hain: I know, and the Foreign Secretary is well aware, not least because of the regular points made rightly by my hon. Friend, of the deteriorating situation in Zimbabwe. The treatment of Roy Bennett and the trade unions in Zimbabwe is outrageous, and there are now reports that the very farms that were commandeered by the Mugabe clique in the so-called land reform process are just lying waste, with not only the white farmers having been driven off them but, in my view, even more importantly, the black workers by the hundred having been left destitute. The way in which Mugabe has allowed such a fantastic country virtually to collapse is outrageous. I repeat that had I ever been eligible to tour with the England team, which is pretty unlikely, I would have refused to tour, as I do not think that any encouragement or succour should be given by English cricketers going out there to play.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): May we please have an urgent debate in Government time on Burma, given that the so-called State Peace and Development Council, the ruling military junta in Burma, is guilty of the most savage violations of human rights every day, in the form of rape as a weapon of war, compulsory relocation, forced labour, the use of human mine sweepers, child soldiers, religious persecution and the bestial destruction of villages on a daily basis, with more than 1,400 political prisoners languishing behind bars? Does the right hon. Gentleman, as a humanitarian, agree that it is important that we have the chance of a debate in this Chamber, so that the argument for a robust European Union sanctions policy on oil, gas and the telecommunications sector can rapidly be developed?

Mr. Hain: I applaud the hon. Gentleman's sentiments. He is increasingly respected across the House for the way in which he focuses on international injustice. Certainly, the injustice in Burma is at least on a par with that in Zimbabwe, and it is one of the really troubled spots across the world. His points are valid, and I am sure that the Foreign Secretary will want to take note of them.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend organise a debate on the adoption and fostering of children? Last year, the House supported an excellent but challenging piece of legislation, with targets that referenced the number of adoptions that should take place year on year. We need reassurance that those targets are being met, and if they are not being met, we need the opportunity to discuss the reasons why. I ask this during national adoption week and remind the House, with great warmth, that the legislation was about one thing: providing a loving and stable family home for vulnerable children, 25 per cent. of whom never achieve that goal.

Mr. Hain: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing this important matter to the House's attention. If she has the opportunity to get a debate on it, I am sure that it will be welcomed by the House. I know that the Minister for Children, Young People and Families will be with her in spirit on the important point that she has made.

Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): May I ask my right hon. Friend for an urgent debate on Post Office Ltd.'s urban reinvention programme and its impact on our communities? In my constituency, Post Office Ltd. has proposed the closure of a post office in an urban neighbourhood renewal area. It makes no sense for one Department to oversee Post Office Ltd. and provide it with public money, while another, which is trying to reinvent local economies and save local shopping precincts, is being undermined by Post Office Ltd.'s closure programme. We need to assess the impact of that programme and have a debate on the matter here on the Floor of the House.

While I have my right hon. Friend's ear, may I draw his attention to South Eastern Trains, which is the only publicly owned and run rail franchise in the country? It is outperforming its private sector predecessor, so is it not about time we had legislation to bring the railways back under public control?

Mr. Hain: I understand that my hon. Friend, who is an excellent Member of Parliament, has just been lucky enough to be selected to serve on the Gambling Bill Standing Committee. The nature of his question illustrates that the story going around that that Committee has been packed with cronies is not true. I understand his point about the Post Office's plans to either close or sell off directly managed Crown post offices, because they form an important hub on our local high streets and are an important part of our towns and cities. Whatever the Post Office does, it is important that it should bear local feelings in mind.

On South Eastern Trains, I note the point that my hon. Friend makes.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): May we have a debate in Government time on the national health service and its priorities? Two people came to see me at my surgery recently. One has no feeling in his arm and has been told that there will be a wait of more than two years for a scan. Another gentleman, who has had back pain for more than three years, has been told that he faces a 40-week wait for his scan. They need scans before they can be treated, and in the meantime they are condemned to live on drugs. It is very stressful for them to have to wait so long for their scans. Can we prioritise that problem in a debate in this House?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman is right to raise any anomalies or difficulties in the system, but he will also understand that waiting lists are plummeting under the Labour Government, as a result of the enormous reform and investment that has gone into the health service. Not everything is perfect, but it will not be until we have reversed the long decades of collapse and decline that took place under the Tories.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that the first major reform of the civil registration service since it was set up in the mid-19th century is now passing through the House, by way of two regulation reform orders, the first of which is before the Committee chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). When I attended the Committee on Tuesday this week, both the Financial Secretary to the Treasury and the Chairman of the Regulatory Reform Committee felt that there should be a debate on this subject, if only to raise awareness among hon. Members that this reform is taking place. When the Committee publishes its report at the end of this month, will my right hon. Friend consider finding time for a debate in Government time on this subject?

Mr. Hain: I shall certainly bear that in mind, because that is an important issue. My hon. Friend has been one of the champions of the reform programme, and the whole House is indebted to him for that. I cannot promise a debate in Government time, but he might wish to apply for a debate in his own name. If he is lucky in that regard, I am sure that the House would welcome such a debate.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Following the excellent question from the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), may I thank the Leader of the House for his full and very sympathetic response? However, the House wants to know whether there will be another debate on the disastrous situation in Zimbabwe, and on the denial of human rights there and the imprisonment of the Member of Parliament, Roy Bennett? The House wants to know what new initiatives the Government are going to take to bring about the end of Mr. Mugabe's tyrannical regime. Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any hope of a further debate and a Government statement on new initiatives?

Mr. Hain: The Foreign Secretary will take questions next week—on Tuesday, I think—and the matter could be raised then. The deterioration in Zimbabwe is very serious, as the hon. Gentleman says. I cannot promise a debate before the end of this Session, for the reasons that I explained a few minutes ago in the business statement, but I shall certainly bear in mind the force of his argument and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): Two weeks ago at business questions, I asked my right hon. Friend to comment on the lack of progress in recent times of the draft Disability Discrimination Bill, which has now passed all its scrutiny stages. Members on both sides of the House are waiting to hear how it can rapidly be progressed. The explanation that he gave was that Conservative members of the usual channels had been blocking the timetable for discussions on the Bill. Will he update us and tell us whether this logjam still exists? When can we expect the Disability Discrimination Bill, as it will become, to be introduced? Does he share my concern that we have no way of bringing an Opposition spokesman to the Front Bench to make a statement to the House and to be taxed on why their party is saying one thing and doing another on this Bill?

Mr. Hain: The opportunity to haul Opposition spokesmen before the House to apologise for their actions would be a novel but attractive procedure. As I announced some weeks ago, the Government intended to introduce the Bill in the House of Lords, but that has not been possible for the reasons that my hon. Friend gave. I hope, however, that we can make early progress on this legislation, if not before Prorogation then very soon afterwards.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): The Leader of the House will be aware that the Government intend to run down or close a whole series of military facilities as part of their defence cuts, although it is unlikely that the Ministry of Defence will confirm the details of the closures before the next election. May we have a debate in Government time on the plans that are being developed to ameliorate the economic and social consequences of base closures and run-downs?

Mr. Hain: First, there are no defence cuts. Defence investment and spending are rising to record levels and have been doing so throughout the entire period of our Government. There has also been the most consistent growth in defence spending. There will be a debate this afternoon in which the hon. Gentleman could raise these matters. As the Secretary of State for Defence and his Ministers have persistently made clear to the House, what is involved is the reorienting of our armed forces to cope with the logistics of modern warfare. That has involved reprioritising expenditure, support and logistics to the front line, and introducing greater efficiency measures across the country. Some tough decisions have had to be taken, but I think that the hon. Gentleman's constituents would want our armed forces to remain the best fighting force in the world and to have the back-up that they need to achieve that, and that they would be prepared to face tough decisions, even in their own localities, to ensure that that happens.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Yesterday, the Prime Minister informed us that certain Members of the House had developed their views on the Government's plans for antisocial behaviour. Would it be possible to find time for the Liberal Democrats to explain to the House how their policy on antisocial behaviour is evolving?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend can apply for a debate on this matter. The change in attitudes in the House towards antisocial behaviour is fascinating, especially on the Liberal Democrat Benches, and I would be fascinated to hear their contribution to such a debate. They have been on a steep learning curve in this regard. As local people have rebelled against their unwillingness to clamp down on antisocial behaviour, they have been driven to accept the good sense and effectiveness of the Government's laws. People across the country have been rebelling in great numbers against their previous dreadful policy.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House confirm that, after the vote on amendment (g) last night, the issue of MPs paying for their workstations in the Palace of Westminster is now dead? Will he also confirm that, after last night's votes, MPs are now to be paid a salary that is some 15 per cent. behind that of the comparators that the House set for itself?

Mr. Hain: The Senior Salaries Review Body looked into Members' salaries and came up with the recommendation that the House endorsed last night. However, I think that there is merit in what the hon. Gentleman has said.

On the questions of workstations and the SSRB's recommendations concerning the impact on the incidental expenses allowance, those will come before the Members Estimate Committee, as we agreed yesterday. I am well aware—as I know you are, Mr. Speaker—of concern throughout the House about what would have happened if the SSRB's recommendation had been delivered unchanged. That would have been seriously disruptive for Members in all parts of the House, based in London and elsewhere. We need to consider the matter carefully, and I can give the hon. Gentleman an absolute assurance that we will.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): May I urge my right hon. Friend to allow the introduction, at an early date, of a Bill to transfer strategic responsibility for the railways to the Secretary of State for Transport? The situation is in urgent need of a review. While the east and west coast main lines have benefited from major investment, the midland main line is the forgotten line. It has old trains, even older signals and a 19th-century track. None of that provides a service for people and businesses in such cities as Sheffield or meets the requirements of the modern age. May we have a Bill, and also a debate about how we can put more investment into the midland main line? Both are urgently needed.

Mr. Hain: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but he should appreciate that there has been a 25 per cent. increase in the number of rail passenger journeys since we came to power, and more than 1,500 more rail services are timetabled every weekday. Nineteen new stations have been built, nine have been reopened and more than 2,000 have been improved. There are still problems owing to the dreadful legacy of underinvestment that we inherited, but things are improving and services in my hon. Friend's area will continue to improve as well.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I am sure that Members will be grateful for the concern about the post office closure programme that the Leader of the House expressed earlier, but they will also be aware that there is probably little chance of a debate before Prorogation. Will the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make a statement to the House, following the questions she was asked about post office closures at Question Time?

Post offices are currently being closed. Two sub-post offices are being closed in Newton Abbot, and the Crown post office is being relocated. A single bidder is involved: there is no open competition. Will the Leader of the House arrange for that statement to be made, and also urge the Post Office not to proceed with any more closures until the Trade and Industry Committee has reported and negotiations with the unions on the closure programme have been completed?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman's points are well understood by the Secretary of State and she will have noted what he has said. I am a great fan of local post offices, including high street Crown post offices. The problem is that local post offices are not used as much as they were because customers are behaving differently. That is why we have supported the rural post office network with hundreds of millions of pounds—I dare say that includes post offices in the hon. Gentleman's constituency—and why we will work with the Post Office to preserve a national network that offers the best possible quality.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend will have noted the dreadful news from Darfur this week. On the eve of the American presidential election we witnessed the antics of the Sudan Government, who used their own army and the police to organise clearances of the most deprived people in the region, the internally displaced persons. The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) and I observed the same antics in Omdurman, where again people were forced out and made to re-buy pieces of land on which they had previously kept their squalid possessions. Will my right hon. Friend convey to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office that there is a limit to how long we will sit back and hope that the north-south dialogue continues in Sudan, while seeing these dreadful incidents occurring time and again?

Mr. Hain: I think that everyone will be sympathetic to the points that my hon. Friend has made so eloquently. The Prime Minister visited Sudan and, following his tough representations, the Sudan Government changed their approach. The Foreign Secretary has also been there, as has the Secretary of State for International Development. We will continue to put pressure on the Sudan Government to ensure that the current desperate situation is alleviated and the conditions that are plaguing people there are eliminated.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): Will the Leader of the House try to find time as soon as possible for a debate on the report of the Joint Committee on the draft Charities Bill? I am sure that it would be beneficial if, before the Government produce a Bill, they could hear the views of Members in all parts of the House and also the huge constituency outside that is extremely interested in the draft terms that will eventually come before us.

Mr. Hain: The Bill is very important. It is one of our flagship Bills and we hope to make early progress with it. The pre-legislative scrutiny was very positive and I do not see a case for a debate on the outcome of that scrutiny before the Bill is introduced. I think that when it is introduced, the hon. Gentleman will be encouraged to note that many of the excellent points made during the scrutiny have been taken on board. I hope that he will be supportive and that the Bill will be given a fair wind by the Opposition.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I strongly agree with what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts).

May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to what I consider to be a growing crisis in the freight industry? There is road and port congestion and poorer links to the continent of Europe, which is so vital to our economy. The Government have rejected the Central Railways scheme and feeble quantities of freight are being transported by rail. We need a serious debate about the future of freight, especially rail freight. Will my right hon. Friend make time for that and also find out what the Government can do to rebuild our freight sector?

Mr. Hain: I understand my hon. Friend's points, although increasing amounts of freight are being transported by rail as our railways benefit from the Government's extra investment. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will pay close attention to what my hon. Friend has said, and my hon. Friend can of course try to secure a debate in his own time. However, I think that he should acknowledge the fantastic improvement that is feeding through the railway network as a result of our huge investment.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Since the abolition of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, it has been much more difficult to table questions relating solely to agriculture and to have them answered in the Chamber, because the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has wider responsibilities. Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate on agriculture as soon as possible, given the serious position in which most dairy farmers now find themselves?

Mr. Hain: The dairy farmers' position is certainly of concern. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is very alive to that and is working with the dairy market and the dairy farm industry to try to help them in whatever way she can. I am not sure that there will be an opportunity for an early debate before Prorogation, but my right hon. Friend will bear in mind what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the effectiveness of the Bill on fireworks control which was introduced last year by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) and supported by the Government? According to the feedback I have received, the Fireworks Act 2003 has proved very effective. A debate would enable us not just to discuss its effectiveness but to clarify the Liberal Democrats' position. One of their senior spokesmen, quoted this week in The Western Mail, seemed to imply that the Bill was an attack on civil liberties.

Mr. Hain: I, too, was astonished by that statement. There was cross-party support—although it seems not to have included the Liberal Democrats—for an important measure, widely welcomed in our communities, to control the abuse of fireworks. With all this flip-flopping by the Liberal Democrats, we do not know where they stand on anything. In fact, they usually stand on more than one thing at the same time, depending on which part of the country is involved.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): The Leader of the House will be aware of the urgent debate taking place in the Home Office and the Metropolitan police on whether serving police officers carrying firearms should have greater personal protection under the law. Can we debate that subject in the House, because there is much concern at the fact that, for the past 30 years, the thousands [illegible] soldiers who served in Northern Ireland and the thousands of officers who served in the Royal Ulster Constabulary were never given any special protection under the law in carrying out their duty?

It is somewhat ironic that Sir John Stevens is promoting a change for the Metropolitan police, because if there is to be legislative change it should apply to all police forces and all soldiers serving in the whole of the United Kingdom in the fight against terrorism, rather than being the preserve of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Hain: I understand the strength of the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. We are all indebted to the bravery of police officers throughout the United Kingdom who have to intervene in the most dangerous and difficult situations involving firearms in order to deal with them. Lessons are being learned, and they should be applied across the country.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Voting ends today in the referendum for the North East assembly. Win or lose, can we expect a statement from the Deputy Prime Minister next week on the implications?

Mr. Hain: Well, let us await the outcome of the referendum—[Laughter.] We have heard before this negative sniggering and name-calling from the Conservatives, who do not want to devolve power to the people. This proposal is about giving the people of the north-east a voice, just as Wales has a voice through its own Assembly and Scotland through its own Parliament. We will see what the outcome of the referendum will be, but the Deputy Prime Minister has never been afraid to make statements to the House or to make himself accountable to it. I pay tribute to the way in which he has led the campaign, as opposed to a lot of Tory attacks and lies from the "No" campaign. They are seeking to deny the people of the north-east the voice that other constituent parts of the United Kingdom enjoy.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): May I bring the Leader of the House back to his comments, and those of the Prime Minister yesterday, about illegal Travellers sites? It is recognised—certainly in my part of the world—that those who promulgate such sites are moving with a great deal more urgency than the Government. May we have a debate on this issue, so that those of us who represent such areas can draw attention to the fears, concerns, distress and, sometimes, anger of our constituents at the inadequacies of the planning law and, for example, the utilities' apparent belief that they have a duty to supply, and to maintain supply to, settlements that are wholly outside the law?

Mr. Hain: As the Prime Minister said yesterday, he very much sympathises with the points that the hon. Gentleman makes. I cannot say that there will be time for such a debate before Prorogation, but the hon. Gentleman can obviously apply for one. Given the feeling throughout the House on this matter, such a debate would be welcome.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): In the light of the new role for Ofsted following the Children Bill—it will inspect children's services across different agencies—do the Government intend to give it any other roles in future, particularly in respect of the frequency with which good schools are inspected? It is vital that parents have information, but it is also important that we focus on the need for Ofsted to inspect schools that are performing well, and in which the parents have confidence. This week, a school in my constituency—St. Katherine's, in Snodland—is being inspected.

Mr. Hain: I have a great deal of sympathy with what my hon. Friend says. We will continue, in the coming years, to put resources into such areas—resources that would be put at risk if we were defeated at the next general election. We are looking not only at making that extra investment but at freeing up the delivery of front-line services in schools and across the public services. My hon. Friend will doubtless be encouraged by the measures that we intend to introduce to take forward the schools inspection agenda. It is true that the proper delivery of higher standards in our classrooms can sometimes be impeded.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I echo the call of the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) for a debate in Government time on the workings of the Adoption Act 1976. National adoption week provides an opportunity to congratulate those local authorities, including Kent, that have achieved a considerable increase in the number of children in care being found loving homes, but there remain huge problems in the courts. There are delays, the advisory service is in a muddle, and judges are sometimes unwilling to realise that if we want people to provide loving homes for these desperately damaged children, they must ease the process along as quickly as possible.

Mr. Hain: The objective of finding loving homes for such children is shared throughout the House, regardless of party, and the Minister with responsibility for such matters will have heard the points that the hon. Gentleman makes.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend will know, there has always been a market for parliamentary memorabilia. In fact, this morning on eBay one could buy a House of Commons ashtray for £4.95, a bottle of whisky signed by John Major for £45 or a House of Commons carrier bag for 99p, but not—despite press reports—any of the new visitors' passes. Can my right hon. Friend shed any light on whether such reports are true?

Mr. Hain: I have been alarmed to discover that, apparently, visitors' passes do not have to be returned when visitors depart the House. I know that the House authorities will pay close attention to this issue and that it will be looked into very carefully—and you, Mr. Speaker, will also be concerned about it. It came to my notice only this morning that visitors' passes can sometimes be kept—indeed, they constitute a fashion accessory in some areas. That is very alarming indeed.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): The Leader of the House expressed great sympathy with the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) regarding the situation in Darfur. Could we have an early statement on the pressure that our United Nations representatives are bringing to bear on the Security Council members present there? Those members may well be trying to keep the peace between nations, but they are doing very little to protect citizens' rights within nations, as they foster their own interests in Sudan and other places.

Mr. Hain: The Government of Sudan have apparently accepted the terms of the United Nations Security Council resolution that we were very instrumental in achieving, but a lot of progress still needs to be made. The situation remains desperate and a lot of stalling is going on in terms of the resolution, so the hon. Gentleman's question is very pertinent.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will have seen speculation in the press that the proposals on identity cards are getting increasingly narrow. Will he use his good offices to ensure that if such a Bill is included in the Queen's Speech, it is designed so that it can be built on as different needs develop? In particular, will he ensure that it is designed to help deal with the terrible new crime of identity theft, which is causing huge problems throughout the country?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. The Home Secretary is in the process of finalising his proposals and he is bearing in mind in particular the pre-legislative scrutiny of such a Bill. He will want to take into account the point that my hon. Friend makes.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend seen the fine early-day motion 1799, on trade unions in Iraq, which is in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann)?

[That this House notes that free trade unionism is a key ingredient of a move from totalitarianism to democracy; welcomes the renewal of free trade unionism in Iraq; and calls on the Government to give assistance and priority to the strengthening of this movement.]

An admirable amendment has been included from my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn), with whom I do not always see eye to eye on Iraq. The early-day motion asks the Government to help strengthen the trade union movement in Iraq, while the amendment encourages the applying of pressure on the Iraqi Government to ensure that changes in trade union law are made, in order to allow trade unions to be properly organised within the public sector—a move supported by the International Labour Organisation and the Iraqi Federation of Trade Unions. May we have a debate on this issue?

Mr. Hain: It would be good to air this issue on the Floor of the House. We are determined to support the creation of a democratic Iraq, not just through elections early next year, but through the other instruments of civil society—especially trade unions—that make a democracy vibrant and possible. The Iraqi people and the Government certainly welcome my hon. Friend's championing of that cause.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): It is anticipated that the Prime Minister will be held personally responsible by many in the press and media, and in the House, for any British deaths in Iraq—I sincerely hope that there will be no more. If it is right and proper for the Prime Minister to be held responsible for those deaths, why is it not right and proper for British employers to be held responsible for the deaths of their employees? After all, as the statistics stand today, there is far more chance of being killed on a British building site than there is in Iraq, although that does not carry the same priority headline in the press.

Mr. Hain: The issue of corporate manslaughter has concerned the Government for some time. We are trying to get our proposals right. I think that my hon. Friend will be encouraged by the progress that we are making and by our intention to take the matter forward with a view to legislation.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for not hanging me out to dry. My right hon. Friend will have seen early-day motion 1845, standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen).

[That this House welcomes the judgement in favour of the Meadows family in their case versus London North Securities; and urges the Government to bring forward legislation to prevent similar activities by loan sharks.]

My right hon. Friend will know about the Meadows family, whose £5,000 debt was multiplied by a factor of 30. Can he arrange for a debate on the subject of loan sharks in the relatively near future—or, instead, will he submit those among his Treasury colleagues who believe that there should be no limit to interest rates and charges to a rugby tackle?

Mr. Hain: I would never dream of hanging my hon. Friend out to dry—I might get very wet in the process if I tried.

By modernising consumer credit markets, we are driving out the rogues and giving consumers many more rights. My hon. Friend is right to identify the scandalous role of loan sharks, which was exposed in a recent court case. Extensive consumer credit reform is in progress. When time permits, we plan to introduce legislation that will make it much easier for people to challenge unfair loan agreements so that they do not have to face the added burden of a lengthy and expensive court battle to rid themselves of the dreadful burden inflicted on them.

Point of Order

1.22 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Page 799 of "Erskine May", which deals with the membership of Standing Committees, says that > "in the case of bills which divide the House on cross-party lines . . . the strength of opinion as expressed in any division at second reading" should be "properly reflected" in the Standing Committee. And of course we know that the Committee of Selection never makes mistakes.

The Leader of the House admitted a few moments ago that there has been criticism of the Standing Committee considering the Gambling Bill, which, it has been suggested, is packed with cronies. None of the 70 Labour rebels—more than the parliamentary membership of the Liberal Democrat party—appears to have been appointed as a member of the Committee. In that light, Mr. Speaker, I ask your guidance as to whether "Erskine May" needs to be reviewed on that point. What is particularly surprising is that I am quoting a brand new edition from 2004 and there it is in black and white. Can you help us on this matter, Mr. Speaker?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can answer that point of order. My understanding is that the vote on Second Reading took place largely along party lines, so I assume that the Committee of Selection took that matter into consideration.

Mr. Hain: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. For the information of the House, I have been advised that none of the 29 Government Back-Bench Members who voted against the Bill applied to sit on the Committee. Similar accusations were made in respect of the Higher Education Bill, but they proved to be groundless as there was vigorous debate during the Committee stage.

Mr. Speaker: In my days as a Back Bencher, a Committee of Selection sometimes invited Back Benchers to sit on a Committee, but I shall not be drawn further on that one.

Defence Procurement

[Relevant documents: The Sixth Report from the Defence Committee, Session 2003–04, HC 572, Defence Procurement; and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6388]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

1.24 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The professionalism and bravery of the men and women who serve in our armed forces are beyond question. We are rightly proud of the job that they do. The Government are committed to providing them with the capabilities and the support that they need in today's increasingly dangerous world. That is why we are investing in defence.

This July's spending review saw the defence budget increase by £3.7 billion over the next three years. That is the longest period of sustained real growth in planned defence spending for more than 20 years. It is our job to make sure that that extra money is spent in the best way possible. We must ensure that it makes a difference at the place where, every day, our armed forces make a difference: the front line.

We will spend more than £6 billion this year on new equipment and more than £8 billion supporting it. The management of those resources is a huge task. In giving our armed forces the best equipment that we can, we are also committed to delivering value for money to the taxpayer. In doing so, we support the British economy, helping to maintain key parts of our manufacturing and technology base.

Our procurement performance and the armed forces' equipment are rightly subject to a huge amount of scrutiny. However, sometimes there is unfair and unbalanced criticism. Yes, there have been disappointing delays and cost growth on some of our major legacy projects, but there have also been significant achievements.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP) rose—

Mr. Ingram: No, let me get on with the statement. It is nice to see the hon. Gentleman in his place, as he did not participate in the last debate and did not attend Defence questions. I know that he is the SNP's defence spokesperson, so he has obviously realised that he has a job to do. I will allow him to intervene later.

Let me provide some recent examples from Operation Telic in Iraq. First, we have seen the successful employment of the devastatingly accurate Storm Shadow missiles for the first time. Then there has been the delivery of the Mamba artillery locating radar system six months early, allowing troops to identify enemy positions, which saves soldiers' lives. Also, the world-leading Bowman personal role radio provided a significant boost to our infantry's capability. The US Marines were so impressed that they bought some of that equipment.

Angus Robertson: I want to pick up on a point of scrutiny. Is it the case that the UK Government, unlike the US Government, still do not publish a comparative report on defence offset and its impact on the economy and defence manufacturing base? Are not foreign contractors obliged to submit regular reports to the Ministry of Defence every six months, updating their progress on UK offset obligations? If it is possible for the US to publish those details and scrutinise offset there, why is it not the case here?

Mr. Ingram: I think that the best thing would be for me to write to the hon. Gentleman about that. There are reasons why we adopt our particular position. It is not because of the lack of intensity of pressure on companies to deliver, or an unwillingness to see the achievement of all the objectives of a procurement stream being implemented within the UK. My experience tells me that there are good reasons why we do not necessarily put these matters under public scrutiny. The hon. Gentleman shrugs his shoulders as if this were a great mystery. My experience in Government tells me that we do not do things lightly, but after long and careful consideration. Sometimes there are good established practices, but it does not mean that we do not consider whether there might be a better way of doing things. I note what the hon. Gentleman says, but as ever, there is more depth to the issue than the headline that he is obviously chasing.

The National Audit Office report on Operation Telic concluded that our equipment performed well and was effectively supported, and that the numerous items of new equipment that we deployed proved their effectiveness. But we are not complacent. We believe that we can do even better and that industry can do better, too. We have set ourselves demanding standards and today's debate will help to explain how we will deliver against those standards. Equipment procurement is not just about today's operations. We have to plan over decades, predicting the challenges that our servicemen and women will face in the future and then equip them to meet those challenges. That is no easy task and there is no simple formula for success.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): I congratulate the Ministry of Defence on selecting MAN ERF UK as the preferred bidder for the biggest defence contract in Europe for 25 years. However, does he agree that some commentators have misunderstood what is happening? They have referred to the German parent company, even though MAN ERF UK is a UK company. It will get the best vehicles for our armed forces, and safeguard thousands of manufacturing jobs in this country. The company will also expand those jobs through the 15 major UK suppliers that it uses, and also at its headquarters, which is in my constituency.

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. As ever, we are subject to bad press. In any procurement decision involving competition there will always be some disappointed companies. As a result, counter-arguments are often stoked up. My hon. Friend played a considerable role in encouraging the final decision, and will know the quality of assessment devoted to this procurement stream. However, although parliamentary pressure is always welcome, we do not always bend to it—nor should we, as we have to take account of a range of factors when we make a judgment. She has alighted on some of the key factors that made this decision appropriate. They include the role that the MOD plays in the UK manufacturing sector, and the vitality and size of this particular procurement stream.

This was a very big decision. It was right to take time with it and to consider all the available options. As a consequence, some companies were disappointed, but I pay tribute again to the contribution made by my hon. Friend to that debate.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): In respect of the support vehicle contract, will the Minister say whether the decision took account of the need to provide offset to the Austrians for the potential contract for the Eurofighter Typhoon?

Mr. Ingram: I have no knowledge of that, but if what the hon. Gentleman says is the case, I shall make sure that my noble Friend Lord Bach, the Minister for Defence Procurement, communicates all the available information. However, the hon. Gentleman should be aware that there are many sensitivities in commercial projects. Some of them can be revealed if the companies so agree, but often they do not want that to happen.

I do not want to say that the issue raised by the hon. Gentleman was a factor in this matter, but revealing all the parameters of a successful bidder means that all the parameters of the unsuccessful bidders must also be revealed. Is that what companies want? I think not. My experience tells me that we should give competitors as much information as we can. That information then goes into the public domain. However, it is always better to treat commercially sensitive information with care, for fear of affecting share prices. A lot of factors have to be balanced in these matters.

I was saying that the procurement process was not easy, and that there was no simple formula for success. I explained some of the aspects of the problem, but it is worth looking at what we are doing in all three services.

We aim to give the Royal Navy an enhanced expeditionary capability. That involves providing two new large aircraft carriers, with the joint combat aircraft providing a more powerful air group than we have ever had before. We will also provide new amphibious shipping for the Royal Marines and, for the Royal Navy, type 45 destroyers—the most powerful air defence destroyers ever built. We will also provide a new submarine fleet based around the Astute class of submarines.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): How many ships are under construction today?

Mr. Ingram: I do not have an answer to that, as I am not a walking abacus or computer. It would be nice if that figure were immediately to hand.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): My hon. Friend knows the answer.

Mr. Ingram: He may know the answer, but it is easy to ask a question when one knows the answer in advance. No doubt an answer will be winging its way here as we speak—or it may sail here—but I am tempted to analyse what is meant by the term "under construction". The hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) is probably not familiar with the MOD's new approach to these matters, in terms of smart acquisition and de-risking. A broad interpretation means that we could say that those factors form part of the construction process. That is why I hesitate about being too precise, but we shall try and get him an answer before the end of the debate, or in the wind-up to be delivered by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary. However, I should be grateful if he defined precisely what he means.

Mr. Viggers: I am happy to clarify my question. By using the term "under construction" I wanted to know how much steel was being cut.

Mr. Ingram: The question could apply to the Astute submarines or the Type 45 destroyers, or to the LSD(A)s—the auxiliary landing ship docks. If the hon. Gentleman wants to talk about the number of hulls involved, I do not think that I could tell him off the top of my head, but we will try and get the information.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): Could my right hon. Friend give an estimate of how many ships would be under construction if we still had a Conservative Government?

Mr. Ingram: There would fewer than under this Government. That is not an unreasonable question, given the cuts that the Conservative party recently announced that it would impose on some critical and key areas of defence spending. All of that needs to be examined. It is not my job to speak for the Opposition on such matters, but I think that it is fair to say that a Conservative Government would be less successful in its approach to defence procurement. As a result, this country would not be making the progress that it is making, or building the largest warship since world war two. That is a very important element, necessitated by the fact that we have to catch up with many of the non-decisions and cuts made by previous Conservative Governments.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): I want to bring the Minister back to his announcement a few minutes ago in respect of the new carriers and air defence destroyers. In the old days, airborne early warning was used to give advanced radar coverage for the fleet. It seems that that principle is being abandoned. Will that result in a decline in our operational capacity, and mean that there is less time for defence of the fleet to be implemented? If so, why?

Mr. Ingram: A range of factors was involved in the judgment on these matters, not least among them the decision not to upgrade the Sea Harrier. It was accepted that our approach to the defence of the fleet involved an element of risk, but that is always the case with our armed forces. As we move towards new procurement, we cannot always maintain the old approach. Legacy systems mean that maintaining the old procurement approach has some very large cost elements. We must strike a balance as we move forward.

In addition, it is worth listening to what the First Sea Lord had to say on these matters. He rightly identified some of the risks involved, but he also highlighted what the new Navy will look like. That new Navy will be better and more agile, and more able to deliver what is required of it as part of an expeditionary force.

Moreover, we believe that we would always work in alliance with other countries in any major conflict. That belief has informed our approach to uplifting the capabilities of NATO and the EU. We want to ensure compatibility and interoperability between naval fleets, and to ensure maximum protection for fleets required to enter dangerous environments

It is true that risks are associated with our approach; when he winds up the debate, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary may be able to give more specifics. I have given the Government's general view of this matter, and hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept the general thrust of my remarks—that we have set in train the biggest programme of warship building since world war two.

Richard Ottaway: That is all right.

Mr. Ingram: As far as the Government are concerned, it is more than all right. We have made a major commitment, and it is one for which previous Governments should have argued in preceding years.

We are giving the Army a highly deployable, flexible and effective mix of capabilities. These include the future rapid effects system. The FRES will be the central pillar, providing a potent medium-weight system able to project power rapidly worldwide. The capabilities also include the introduction into service of the Apache attack helicopter, which will provide a step change in our ability to engage land targets with agility and precision and at range.

We are enabling the RAF to strike with accuracy and devastating effect, as well as to deliver our forces rapidly and in strength. We are now taking delivery of Typhoon aircraft. The RAF is delighted with its performance and reliability so far, which have greatly exceeded expectations. Additional C-17 and A400M capability will further enhance our strategic lift. Those are just some of the big-ticket items, and I will touch on many more in my contribution.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): The Minister has mentioned some of the high-tech procurement, and I am grateful for that because I have BAE Systems in my constituency and I am proud of what that company achieves. On the low-tech side, I have some firms that have suffered because a clothing contract has been given to a Northern Ireland firm that has outsourced provision to China. A constituent came to see me last weekend and pointed out that the French are able to ensure that the clothing provided to their servicemen and women is manufactured in France. Could we do that, and if so, why do we not take that opportunity to back British business?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman asked how we can back British business, but—as he said—the contract went to a UK company. The detailed background to the cut and sew contract is not in the public domain, but several firms made bids. Examination of the competing bids also entailed significant sourcing outside the UK. The conclusion showed that significant savings could be achieved for the MOD and, therefore, the taxpayer. The contract provides value for money and uses a supply route in which we have every confidence. I repeat that the contract did not go to a parent company outside the UK. We are sourcing from the UK, but the supply chain is a matter for the prime companies.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not suggest that we should do what other nations do, which is to impose conditions on contracts. That leads to overpriced contracts, which means that we cannot make savings that can be invested in defence spending elsewhere. That balance has to be struck in any procurement decision. We do not have such a protective system and nor did the Conservative Governments of long and distant memory. We have to ensure that we have a robust contract that will deliver on time, on value and on quality. That is what we believe we have achieved in that case.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): The Minister was right to go through the broad aspects of the Army, Navy and Air Force main procurements. Will he say anything about procurement for the Royal Fleet Auxiliary, especially the Military Afloat Reach and Sustainability—or MARS—programme? As he knows, while the two new carriers and the new assault ships are welcome, they will not be sufficiently deployable unless they have support ships to refuel and rearm them in combat. The MARS programme is a substantial programme that will place huge demands on our design and shipbuilding but is vital to the future of the Royal Navy.

Mr. Ingram: I agree that the MARS programme is important. I am increasingly intrigued by Opposition spokesmen who make demands but never put a ticket price on them. They give lists of everything they want, but deny that they amount to spending commitments. They say that they want us to do this and that, but they never reveal their total commitment in each area. Nor do they ever say what they would take out of the existing programme to make way for their demands. If we are to have an honest and open debate on procurement—

Mr. Keetch: Answer the question, and then we might do so.

Mr. Ingram: Well, I have said that the MARS programme is important. Our whole approach to expeditionary warfare requires support shipping. How we pay for that and the timing of its provision are issues for the procurement stream. As I said, we are spending £6 billion this year on procurement and £8 billion to sustain it. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman would want to spend more.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): I wish to take my right hon. Friend back to the issue of the desert field jacket, the contract for which was awarded to Cooneen in Northern Ireland. He has written to me on the issue and I am grateful for that. I do not know whether he has yet had sight of the letter from the chairman of Carrington, a company in the north-west, but it reveals that it has been 19 weeks since the contract was award to Cooneen. In that time, the Chinese subcontractor—People's Liberation Army factory No. 3533 in Chongqing—has not been able to produce fabrics that meet the specifications for tensile strength, tear strength, shrinkage and infra-red reflectance. How long does Cooneen have to meet the specifications in the contract before it is awarded elsewhere? [Interruption.]

Mr. Ingram: I hear the snide comments from the Opposition. Is it suggested that we should have a trade embargo with China? [Interruption.] Well, it is nice to know that that is not what is suggested. Outsourcing in China is an acceptable part of a process put in place by any prime contractor. All contracts have to be subject to evaluation as they proceed. That happens in all procurement streams, and if contractors do not supply on quality, on time and on the required numbers, the penalty will fall on them. They will then have to find other sourcing methods. If contractors do not deliver, it is their failure and we hold them to account for it. That is exactly what would happen on the contract my hon. Friend mentions. He said that he had a letter about the contract, but several allegations have already been made about it. All of them have been investigated, and the allegations he makes will also be investigated. We owe that to the people who depend on the equipment procured, be it uniforms or the big-ticket items I have already mentioned. We will give consideration to the points that he makes, but making an allegation does not make it a fact or accurate. We will have to examine the allegations.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Ingram: I wish to make some progress. I have always been generous to my hon. Friend, although I am not so sure that he is always generous to me. I will come back to him in a moment, but I wanted to comment further on the big-ticket items and how we are trying to deliver in some very demanding procurement areas. There is no easy or simple formula.

We have received criticism from the Defence Committee, as well as from some ill-informed sections of the media. We are not letting down the armed forces. Not only is the criticism in the recent report misleading, it is unfair and demoralising to all those people in the Defence Procurement Agency, both service and civilian, who work so hard for our men and women on the front line. I am conscious of the fact that my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Defence Committee is present. I do not know whether he will seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South) (Lab): Yes, I will.

Mr. Ingram: No doubt my right hon. Friend will make his points. I am sure that he recognises that we normally have robust exchanges between the Defence Committee and the Ministry of Defence, and where criticisms are levelled, a reasoned response is always given, but he should perhaps also recognise that the strong response on this occasion was caused by some of the wildly wrong comments and criticisms in the report.

The DPA comprises about 3,500 civilian and military personnel, all of whom work extremely hard, but we are told that they are working in a climate of fear—a statement that was never made by any member of the MOD, although it somehow appears in the report. I will not go into all the detail in the report; we have more useful things to discuss. No doubt the Chairman will tell us his point of view in great detail, but let us have a balanced debate. As I say, I believe that some of those comments are very misleading, unfair and unquestionably demoralising for those who are trying to do what is undoubtedly a very difficult job.

I shall say more about the improvements that we continue to make in our procurement processes, but first I want to say something about what we are trying to achieve with our procurement plans—our vision, to use the jargon. Before I do so, I will give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson). I hope that he still remembers his question.

Mr. Davidson: I do indeed. I take very much to heart the point that the Minister made when he said that I am insufficiently generous to him. He has perhaps not been listening to what I have been saying about some of his colleagues.

I very much welcome the enormous shipbuilding orders that are in the pipeline, but will the Minister expand a little on the management of the relationship between the MOD and the industry? Will he speak about how he is trying to avoid boom and bust and how dialogue is emerging to ensure that peaks and troughs are evened out? Will he tell us when the maritime coherence study might be published? In particular, what can he do to avoid the redundancy of design staff, who are rapidly running out of work on Clydeside and for whom no work is available in the short term?

Mr. Ingram: I take that as a very generous and helpful comment. I will consider what my hon. Friend says about my colleagues, and I may sleep better at night knowing that he is less of an enemy of mine than of theirs.

Mr. Davidson: A critical friend.

Mr. Ingram: Okay, if my hon. Friend wants to put it that way; my colleagues may see things differently. I shall say something later about the important issue that he raises, and he may want to intervene then.

People often focus on specific pieces of equipment—that is understandable, and it has happened already in the debate—but it is important that those pieces of equipment combine to generate the capabilities needed to meet the threats of the future. Last July, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence outlined in his statement on future capabilities how the coming years will involve continued movement away from the traditional emphasis on numbers of platforms and people to an emphasis on effects and outcomes.

We no longer face the threat of the cold war, but myriad threats and opportunities. The type of technology and the options for the associated equipment that we can procure for our armed forces in the future are equally varied and numerous. The capabilities of our armed forces and the military effect that they can deliver are growing year by year. Increasingly, we can combine intelligence with target acquisition, modern communications and precision weaponry. The result is changing the nature of modern warfare. For example, in Iraq, the RAF was able to hit more of its targets with less ordnance and therefore fewer aircraft than ever before: 85 per cent. of our air-dropped munitions were precision-guided bombs. That represents a step change in capabilities over the relatively short period of a decade.

In the future, military operations will involve the rapid, accurate and decisive delivery of critical military effect at the right moment. Again, to use the jargon, that is known as effects-based warfare, the key to achieving which will be the agility and flexibility of our forces and the platforms that they operate from. Procurement is crucial to delivering that transformation. Too often in the past, procurement decisions were made through replacement thinking—automatically replacing ageing platforms with new ones designed to do much the same job. These days, our procurement decisions are increasingly made on the basis of capability, flexibility and inter-operability. We need adaptable and flexible capabilities that we can use alongside our allies.

I want to outline three elements of our vision for delivering those capabilities: network-enabled capability; defence industrial policy; and equipment acquisition reform. Let me deal with network-enabled capability first because it is central to effects-based warfare. It is not a weapon, but a concept of war, and it cannot just be bought off the shelf. Put simply, it is a linked network of systems, platforms and headquarters that can all communicate with one another in real time. It allows up-to-date intelligence and information to be delivered exactly where it is needed most, so our commanders achieve the rapid, pinpoint response that we require. That is not just a future aspiration.

In Iraq, we have seen the difference that networked capability can make. The Mamba artillery detection radar, which is a procurement success story, was recently used in concert with our communications network to pinpoint enemy firing positions. Fire was then brought to bear from coalition aircraft at the precise time and location that it was needed. That is a graphic demonstration that our NEC approach is already paying dividends.

At the strategic level, our investment in the Skynet 5 satellite system—the largest private finance initiative contract ever awarded by the MOD—will provide secure communications between strategic decision makers and front-line forces. That secure network will extend to the operational and tactical levels, using systems such as Cormorant and Bowman, both of which are at an advanced stage. Bowman entered service in March this year, with Cormorant due in service in 2005.

Of course, the network will be only as good as what is connected to it. That is why we are investing in state-of-the-art technologies from surveillance assets, such as the Watchkeeper unmanned aerial vehicle, to other world-beating air, land and maritime capabilities for the delivery of effect in theatre, such as Typhoon, Apache and the aircraft carriers.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The Minister has alluded to the fact that BAE Systems is one of the key suppliers of the type of weapons system to which he has referred. Will he confirm that the MOD has no doubts about the integrity and probity of the company in the way that it has conducted its business for his Department and for contracts abroad?

Mr. Ingram: We have very good relations with BAE Systems and all our major suppliers throughout the supply chain. I know about the criticisms that have been made. I have heard people say that there could be corruption at the highest level between the industry and the MOD. If they say that, they must make it stack up. This goes back to the importance and vitality of what we do in procurement and the way in which it delivers not just for individual companies and their employees but for the good of the British economy. Crucially, what the suppliers deliver is vital to our war-fighting and peacekeeping capabilities. I endorse the point of view expressed by the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: No, I want to make progress now.

I have already mentioned the new aircraft carriers and Type 45 destroyers. Our amphibious capability has been enhanced most recently by the introduction of the assault ship, HMS Albion, in July last year. HMS Albion will be joined by her sister ship, HMS Bulwark, this December. Our future maritime expeditionary force will therefore be better placed to support the land component—a vital element of any military intervention, which is known in the jargon as the boots on the ground. Our future procurement plans will also ensure that the Army is ready for whatever it will face.

I have mentioned FRES, but better-balanced land forces also need flexible, highly capable support. Helicopters provide a flexible attack and lift capability. Over the next decade, a significant part of our helicopter fleet will be retired from service. We therefore intend to invest about £3 billion over the next 10 years to replace and enhance that capability. The Apache attack helicopter is the most recent addition to our fleet. Apache gained initial operating capability on 28 September, and any hon. Member who has seen it will know that it is an awesome aircraft. It will provide the Army with an unprecedented long-range precision attack capability.

Our commitment to more flexible and deployable forces is also borne out elsewhere in the air environment. Our planned purchase of an extra C-17 and 25 A400M military airlifters will boost the tactical and strategic airlift for all three services in times of peace, crisis and war.

Delivering all that capability is done through a partnership between the Ministry of Defence and industry, so safeguarding our forward equipment programme and equipping and sustaining our front-line forces are central to safeguarding that partnership. That brings me on to the defence industrial policy, which is the second element of our vision that I want to touch on.

The Government are committed to a strong and healthy UK defence industry. The defence industry brings significant economic benefits to the UK. It creates employment, technology and intellectual property.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Ingram: If I am going to give way to my hon. Friend, I trust that he will not be asking about the Defence Aviation Repair Agency—I live in hope.

Mr. Smith: Not on this occasion. My right hon. Friend mentioned the defence industrial policy and the need to retain capability. He rightly said that the Apache will come into operation, but there is a large capability requirement for new helicopters and our helicopter industry depends on that. Does he anticipate that there will be an early announcement on that? Does he think that it will benefit the British-based helicopter industry?

Mr. Ingram: I do not know what my hon. Friend means by "early". I was grateful that he did not raise DARA, although he often raises the important matter of DARA St. Athan on behalf of his constituents.

I said that some £3 billion would go into the rotary fleet, and that vital investment will have a major impact on British industry. The work on, and consideration of, that process are currently going on and major suppliers will form part of those discussions. The general answer to my hon. Friend is yes, but I cannot give him a time line. I know how assiduous he is, so I have no doubt that he will be on the case and pursue the matter vigorously in the months ahead.

We have made great advances in our relationships with our suppliers. It is now more than two years since we published our defence industrial policy, which was a watershed. For the first time, we brought together all the issues that affect our relationship with industry into a single, coherent policy. It was developed against a backdrop of huge industrial consolidation.

In the area of market access, we are addressing the barriers to UK industry in our allies' markets. The defence exports and market access forum has been set up jointly with industry to address issues that affect our ability to participate in overseas markets. While we are on the subject of participation, it is worth noting that we have just appointed John Wall, the national officer for the Amicus trade union, to the National Defence Industries Council. Partnership with industry means just that: there is partnership with not only the companies but those who deliver the product—the work force.

We have taken a leading role in Europe on shaping the new defence agency. The agency's principal purpose is to improve member states' military capabilities. It will do that by easing access to member states' markets, improving the flow of information and technology across borders and creating an environment that allows companies to co-operate more closely. Our closer relationship with European partners does not jeopardise our relationship with the US in any way. We have always been clear that maintaining both relationships is crucial. Nearly 18 months ago, the Prime Minister signed an agreement with President Bush to increase co-operation on military and defence matters even further. Progress has been much slower than we would like, and has not been helped by some in Congress who continue to stand in the way of an international traffic in arms regulations waiver for the UK.

Although we are encouraged by the positive language in the recent US Defence Authorisations Bill about the processing of export licences, it does not address the root cause of barriers to co-operation. We need a US system that recognises not only that the UK is wholly trustworthy but that it has the necessary legislation to safeguard sensitive information and control arms exports. It is high time for the intent of our agreements to be translated into concrete actions that meet the needs of both our Governments. We will continue to press the new Administration on that point.

Our defence industrial policy also sets out the factors that we take into account when assessing acquisition options. In addition to factors such as security of supply, we also take account of impact on the industrial base, such as the level of investment in intellectual property, facilities and employment in the UK. The globalisation of the defence business means that the UK defence industry embraces suppliers that bring benefit to, and create value in, the UK, regardless of the nationality of their shareholders.

We are now working on the next step: developing the policy into an industrial strategy. That will explain more clearly which technologies and industrial skills are most important for maintaining existing capabilities and which we expect to require in the long term. That is a major undertaking, but the output will inform better the investment decisions of industry and the Government alike.

We have also been working hard to develop our industrial strategy in the shipbuilding sector, which my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Pollok mentioned. The current programme has the potential to create or secure several thousand jobs in UK shipyards and their suppliers. However, I appreciate that without a reasonable amount of programme stability, core skills might be lost and we may thus be unable to build on experience or achieve longer-term investment in modern facilities. Ministry of Defence and Department of Trade and Industry officials and representatives from the shipbuilding industry have been meeting on a regular basis.

We have been examining the industry for some time. In summer 2003, the supplier relations group began a study on the UK naval shipbuilding industry. That study was complementary to the RAND study on UK shipbuilding capacity. The output from the studies has underscored the need to develop an industrial strategy for UK shipbuilding that supports the delivery of the forward programme and promotes a healthy and economically viable industry in the long term.

We do not wish to impose change on shipbuilding or any other part of industry. We aim to work together to establish changes to the way in which we conduct our business that both sides need. For example, we are involved in close dialogue with the aerospace industry about how we both need to change so that we can deliver our future programme.

Both aerospace and shipbuilding are key industries. We are working in greater partnership with industry and we need a more open-book examination of the situation. We must deal with the peaks and troughs and ensure that we have capacity when we need it. We must ensure that we have core capability when we need it. The important thing is to establish a way in which we can smooth the process while achieving that. There will be difficulties, because individual companies that are at different phases of their future plans have competing demands, but there is determination to find a solution.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): Will not budgetary pressures smooth out the capacity problems?

Mr. Ingram: I am not sure of the precise meaning of the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Burnett: I can try to explain.

Mr. Ingram: Let me try to understand what the hon. Gentleman means, because I want to make progress. The amount invested in the procurement stream must have an impact on it—that is a given. The industry knows that, but it is beginning to realise that the cash register is no longer in place. We will not feed a future overspend in the present, so we must deal with the situation. Is the hon. Gentleman asking for the budget to be increased, and if so, by what amount? [Interruption.] I am only posing the question.

Mr. Burnett: I am asking an entirely sensible question. The shipbuilding consortium talks about a bunching of contracts because of the process of re-fleeting. I am asking whether normal budgetary constraints will smooth out the process.

Mr. Ingram: That would depend on the nature of the proposition when set against the budgets, which is what is being discussed. I accept the premise on which I thought that the hon. Gentleman's earlier question was based, but budgets must have an impact on the procurement stream. We must get the balance right because we need future capability. We need to be able to ensure that it will exist when we need it, so we need to talk with industry sensibly and openly, but equally it has to talk to us realistically. We are not involved in a one-way process. We are the main purchaser and we keep the shipyards open. As I have said before, if there were no MOD spending in British shipyards, there would be no shipbuilding industry. I am sure that that message has struck home.

We also work closely with industry on research and development in the UK. The MOD spends £2.6 billion per year on research and development, which is comparable with the largest private investor in any sector.

On our acquisitions strategy, I have highlighted the successes of our procurement system and the wide-ranging work to develop our industrial policy, but we cannot let it rest there. In May 2003, we commissioned a review of the Defence Procurement Agency's progress in implementing smart acquisition. The review confirmed that the principles of smart acquisition were the right ones, but it also recommended a programme to enhance its application, including new and improved processes. Those focus on project review; financial management; supplier management; and greater joint working with the Defence Logistics Organisation. The changes will be supported by other initiatives, such as the establishment of senior responsible owners for major projects, to strengthen the governance process. We are also increasing the funding provided in early years to de-risk projects where we are working with complex leading-edge technology.

One example of de-risking is FRES, which recently made considerable progress. The assessment phase is gaining momentum and Atkins has been selected as the systems house preferred bidder. The systems house will be independent of any product range or manufacturing capability. Its project management, systems engineering and risk management expertise will provide objectivity and reduce risk early in the programme. In the case of the carriers, we have extended the assessment phase of the programme as part of the process of de-risking it.

Successive National Audit Office reports have endorsed the importance of up-front technology risk reduction. We have taken that message on board. I have set out how we are driving that forward. That is, perhaps, long overdue, and perhaps lessons should have been learned earlier, but we have now taken those messages on board and are driving forward those fundamental changes.

Leadership of the acquisition process, within both the Defence Procurement Agency and the Defence Logistics Organisation, is being driven by the very top of the Department, and all the issues—military, scientific, financial and industrial—involved in acquisition are being addressed. The changes are being managed through a new acquisition policy board chaired by the Minister for Defence Procurement, Lord Bach. The process is part of our overarching structure, which is driving forward major transformation in the way in which we go about our business, from procurement, through logistic support, to a better structured, more flexible and capable front line.

The Government are investing in defence. It is worth repeating that for the third successive spending review we have announced real growth in the defence budget. That is without precedent since the mid-1980s. We are committed to ensuring that that extra funding is spent in the best way and delivers where it can make a difference—at the front line.

I have outlined the three elements of the transformation of procurement that is necessary to deliver the capabilities vital to future military operations. To do that, we must continue to take the right decisions for defence. Those decisions might be hard for some, but are none the less essential. Change and transformation is not an easy process, but the gains it will deliver are what our front-line needs.

In conclusion, do we have a perfect track record on procurement? No, but no Government ever have. Are we getting better? Yes, unquestionably. Are we determined to provide the best equipment for our armed forces that we can? Absolutely. The men and women of our armed forces deserve nothing less.

2.13 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): As is my custom, I start on a note of agreement. My hon. Friends and I join the Minister in paying tribute to the courage and professionalism of our armed forces. I am sure that I speak for the whole House when I say that.

I also endorse what the Minister said about some of our equipment. Storm Shadow has performed superbly in Iraq. It was brought into operation early, which speaks volumes for Britain's defence industry and the quality of our scientists and engineers who ensure that such equipment is delivered. We endorse the C-17 as important heavy-lift equipment. We have consistently supported the principle of the two new aircraft carriers. I have said before that I issued a press release welcoming the Government's decision to go for the short take-off and vertical landing variant of the joint strike fighter and to incorporate in the design of the carriers the possibility of retrofitting the catapult. There is common ground, but inevitably there are disagreements.

A recent report stated:

> "Our Armed Forces have been let down by the organisation tasked with equipping them".

Those are not my words, but the conclusion of the Defence Committee. Its recent report on defence procurement exposed how the Government's procurement process is in almost complete disarray. It is hard to recall when I last read a report by a Committee dominated by Members of Parliament of the governing party that was so overtly critical of the Government, so much so that it led to the extraordinary situation of the Government virtually rejecting the report out of hand. Worse still for the Government, however, is that it was one of a succession of critical reports exposing their inability to get a grip on their procurement process.

The reports follow on from another series of reports on the Government's approach to the equipping of our armed forces for the recent Iraq war. All concluded that there was deficiency in the provision of some kit. I remind the Minister that one of our accusations was sustained by the National Audit Office, which said that there was insufficient kit in theatre. It gave three reasons for that. First, there were insufficient stocks on the shelves. It did not entirely criticise the Government for that because it accepted that it was not possible to keep a vast array of kit on the shelves that may not be required. Secondly, there was difficulty in getting some of the kit into theatre. Again, that involves logistics issues, which we all understand. However, the NAO's third point was that the Government had allowed insufficient time to make up the shortfall of the kit that was not on the shelves. The Government have not been able to defend that serious accusation, which we lay at their door, and we pray in aid the NAO in support of our position.

I must tell the Minister, who speaks on behalf of the Minister for Defence Procurement, that the argument has again surfaced in connection with the court martial that concluded yesterday. It was told that > "training for soldiers who were to be deployed to Iraq was delayed because of the attempts to negotiate a peaceful settlement."

That is simply unacceptable. It illustrates the fault at the heart of the Government, not only in equipping our armed forces, but in training them. They did not allow sufficient time for either equipping or training because they were concerned that that would send the message to their Back Benchers that they were preparing for war at the same time as they were negotiating at the United Nations. I am afraid to say that as a result our armed forces were betrayed. Yesterday's verdict in a court martial further confirms the extent of that betrayal.

Mr. John Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the overall judgment of the NAO report was that the operation was a logistical success and that we deployed into theatre in half the time that it took 10 years ago in the first Iraq war?

Mr. Howarth: Of course I accept that, but I cannot ignore—the House and the country would not want me to—the criticisms that have been made. Those specific and detailed criticisms go to the heart of the Government's thinking about the planning for the operations. In the world of realpolitik, we understand that it is necessary for a party to carry its Back Benchers with it, but the armed forces must not be sacrificed, and their safety not imperilled, by the political imperative of the Government of the day who are unwilling to face up to their Back Benchers, who might be hostile to military action. The result is that the troops do not get the kit that they want or do not get it in time.

Mr. Keetch: Is not another example of the point that the hon. Gentleman is making the large number of urgent operational requirement orders that were placed in the run-up to the Iraq war? That clearly shows that forces were being sent without being properly equipped. It is worth remembering that this was not a war that occurred suddenly, like the first Gulf war or the Falklands war. This was a war of our timing, which should not have been started until our forces were ready to begin the conflict properly.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman reinforces my point and I am grateful to him for doing so, particularly as he comes from a slightly different position on these matters. What he says about urgent operational requirements, which amounted to about £500 million, also illustrates the point. However, the National Audit Office was right to say that it would not be reasonable to expect any Government to have on the shelves, ready to use, equipment for 50,000 troops in the Arctic, the desert, temperate climates and so on. We must be reasonable; taxpayers' money is at stake.

Only last month the Public Accounts Committee published a highly critical report on the Government's management of their 20 largest projects. That report, based on the equally damning NAO 2003 major projects report, cited cost overruns of £3.1 billion and an average delay of 18 months across the 20 largest projects. The Defence Committee described the performance of the Defence Procurement Agency as "woeful". On the cost increases, the Committee concluded:

> "Such substantial cost increases are also likely to have an impact beyond defence procurement and result in cuts elsewhere. Given the recent pressures on our Armed Forces, we believe such impacts would be unacceptable."

I am sure the House would agree. How are those cost overruns to be funded? From cuts elsewhere? If so, it is incumbent on the Minister to tell us where.

Since the Government came to power, spending on defence has fallen both in real terms and as a share of gross domestic product.

Mr. Davidson: Would it not be helpful to point out to the House that the largest cost overruns were on projects inherited from the previous Conservative Government?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman will have to wait for what I am about to say on that topic.

Mr. Davidson: That is a yes, then.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman will hear the answer.

Despite the claims made by the Minister in his opening speech about how much more is being spent on defence by the Labour Government—I leave aside the extensive extra commitments to which they have subjected our armed forces—defence spending in 2004–05 will be almost £1 billion less in real terms than it was in 1995–96. Defence expenditure was then 3 per cent. of GDP. By 2005–06 it is set to fall to 2.3 per cent. of GDP, resulting in reductions in equipment, platforms, manpower and overall funding to the front line.

Demands on our frontline forces are far greater than envisaged by the strategic defence review, and the message from the White Paper is that those demands are likely to increase. The White Paper is littered with modern MOD-speak such as "capabilities-based approach" and "effects-based warfare", terms deployed in today's debate by the Minister. Those are a cloak to mask the cuts resulting from decisions made in No. 11 Downing street. We have been warning that such cuts would lead to dangerous capability gaps and place our front-line forces at risk. We cited the withdrawal of the Sea Harrier as an obvious example.

The First Sea Lord said:

> "You will need a lot of type 45 destroyers to give the same coverage as a naval air defence fighter."

That accords with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway). We have also raised serious concerns about the repeated claims by the Secretary of State that numbers no longer count and that it is capabilities that are important; again, a point made by the Minister. But no one unit of capability can ever be in two places at once. The First Sea Lord has been honest about the risks that the Government are running. As he told the latest issue of Warship World in respect of the Government's proposed 20 per cent. cut in the number of destroyers and frigates:

> "My gut feeling is that we need a DD/FF force"— that is, destroyer/frigate force—

> "of about 30 ships . . . I would still much rather not be losing those Type 23s. It is a painful cut, and I believe we are taking a risk. We shouldn't delude ourselves."

That is precisely what the Minister was doing in his opening address.

[Mr. Howarth]

The Defence Committee endorsed the concerns expressed by the First Sea Lord and from the Conservative Benches. The Committee stated on page 9 of its report:

> "We also consider that a policy of reducing the existing number of platforms in advance of acquiring the new capabilities is potentially dangerous."

We agree. That is why our commitment to spend £2.7 billion more on the front line than the Government are spending will allow us to ensure that our armed forces are fully funded.

It is appalling that the Minister left his Prime Minister so exposed to my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition the other day, when the Prime Minister was clearly unaware of the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor and my hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State for Defence. It was extremely neglectful of Ministers in the Ministry of Defence to leave the Prime Minister so obviously ignorant and in danger of misleading the House, but perhaps that is no surprise coming from the current Secretary of State, who is fairly cavalier about such things.

Mr. Ingram: I recognise the headline figures that the hon. Gentleman is bandying around. If £1.1 billion is to be funded from cuts elsewhere in Government programmes, will he tell us where? If £1.6 billion is to be taken out of defence expenditure, on top of the £2.8 billion efficiency changes that we are making, that means a £4.4 billion cut in defence activity. Will he give an indication of where that extra £1.6 billion-worth reduction in activities is to come from?

Mr. Howarth: The debate is about procurement issues, but let me address the Minister's comments. The James committee, led by an experienced businessman with a fantastic track record of turning round ailing businesses—he would be hugely advantageous to the Government—identified substantial savings across other Departments, of which £1.1 billion, I assure the right hon. Gentleman, is a drop in the ocean. The Government cannot stomach the fact that they are making so-called efficiency savings, but nobody else can make efficiency savings beyond those that they have identified. I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that we have done our sums. The figures are in the public domain and we stand by them. I assure him that we will be able to fund all that we intend to do for our armed forces, which will be significantly more than the Government are prepared to do.

Perhaps the Minister could answer a point on the annual report and accounts of the Defence Procurement Agency. In 2003–04 capital commitments amount to £14 billion in round figures, contracted but not provided for; £14 billion of commitments for which the Government have no money. So we are taking no lessons from them. The Conservative party is determined to ensure that our armed forces are properly funded for the tasks that we give them.

It is six years since the Government introduced their policy of smart acquisition and the results of the policy have been, at best, mixed. The Chief of Defence Procurement, Sir Peter Spencer, told the Defence Committee earlier this year that of the seven aims of smart acquisition, only one had been met. The Committee accordingly concluded:

> "We find it immensely disappointing that the Smart Acquisition initiative, launched some six years ago, has yet to deliver its aim of procuring equipment faster, cheaper, better."

That is pretty damning stuff, and it is easy to see why the Minister felt stung by the vehemence of the charges and felt constrained to respond so vehemently just now to the Committee.

However, the MOD has itself admitted that smart acquisition has not been applied in the way that was envisaged on some of the newer projects, and that it has failed to bring the anticipated improvements to legacy projects, to which the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) just referred. It is not the Committee with which Ministers should be taking issue; rather it is their own chief of defence procurement. It was Sir Peter who predicted that this year's accounts were likely to present another problem year.

The problem with smart acquisition is not so much the policy itself but its implementation. The Government's failure properly to implement their own policy has meant that some of the potential savings, which could have been achieved through improved management of risk, through life management and a partnership with industry, have not been achieved, and it is to those key areas that I wish to turn.

On risk management, the Public Accounts Committee concluded:

> "The Department admitted that the figures showed that some projects had not been properly de-risked in the Assessment Phase and this was an indication that Smart Acquisition was not being applied thoroughly or consistently."

Much more needs to be done to manage risk. The SDR sets out that 15 per cent. of a project's budget should be spent prior to the key decision-making point, known in the trade as main gate, to try to reduce that risk. However, smart acquisition projects have seen only 4.4 per cent. of their total budget being spent prior to main gate, well short of that target of 15 per cent. that the Government have set themselves.

The Minister has just told us that the Government have taken that message on board, and we welcome that, but they are a long way short of achieving the objective that they themselves have set. It is no good their bleating on that the problems are exclusively with projects started by the last Conservative Government, because Sir Peter admitted last week that one of the reasons smart acquisition projects had not encountered difficulties similar to those of the so-called legacy projects was that they were in the relatively early stages, and could well run into problems later in the procurement cycle when such difficulties traditionally arose. So the answer to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok is that the jury is out on his Government's own projects. We wait to see whether the Government fulfil their own commitments.

Part of the solution is to ensure that there is adequate research funding. However, the amount spent on research has been falling since the Government came to power. At £450 million, the current research budget is less than half the total research budget in 1990. We acknowledge that the culture around the DPA is increasingly one of risk-aversion—not fear—to which the Defence Committee drew attention, as officials seek to limit the risk of a kick in the backside by the NAO, the PAC and the Select Committee. It must be given some leeway to explore the possibilities of science, without feeling at every point that it may be kicked. I hope that we can share that aim with the Government. This is not a criticism of the Government, but a criticism of the system, and together we must find ways to address that, so that the DPA scientists can do their job without feeling that if they fail at the cutting edge of technology, they will be kicked in the backside, because that is not the answer.

There are serious issues here. Rolls-Royce tells me that unless it has some support for the hot-end development of its aero-engines, it could shift the company out of the United Kingdom. That is a serious issue to which I urge Ministers to pay attention. If Rolls-Royce were to move out of the UK, I suspect that there would be an uproar; not an attack on the company, which is answerable to its shareholders, but an attack on the Government who allowed that to happen.

There continue to be great concerns about the future of Qinetiq, in which, as the Minister knows, I have a vested interest, as its headquarters are in my constituency. My hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State for Defence fully shares my concerns on that front. The Minister must face the fact that being starved of resources for the development of new technology is driving business to the United States, where Qinetiq's minority shareholder, Carlyle, is based. Once the business is in the United States, we then face the difficulties of repatriating the benefit of that development work to the United Kingdom, thanks to the operation of the international traffic in arms regulations in the United States, to which the Minister referred.

Another issue of concern was raised at the weekend in The Observer, although for that reason I naturally take it with a pinch of salt. Ministers should come to the House and tell us their policy on the whole issue of defence research. If it is true that there are people who now believe that it is not worth working in the defence sector and that they should hawk around the world their experience and the knowledge that they have gained from working in UK secret defence establishments, that is a serious issue that we need to address.

The MOD defines through life management as > "an integrated approach to all Smart Acquisition process, planning and costing activities across the whole system and whole life of a project".

In May last year the NAO released its report on through life management at the MOD. It found that the MOD and DPA had been slow to recognise its potential benefits and were not doing enough to achieve effective through life management. In particular, the NAO had criticisms of the interface between the DPA and the Defence Logistics Organisation, such as incompatible information technology systems and different financial reporting systems.

The inability to transfer a project seamlessly between those two organisations was preventing the MOD from achieving a genuine through life approach. The next Conservative Government will take steps to ensure that the DPA becomes a much leaner organisation, and that the relationship between it and the DLO is such that major capital projects in particular are managed through their life without an artificial interruption as they pass from one organisation to the other.

The NAO described progress as "patchy", and said that the almost complete absence of a role for the second customer and for the supplier following a project's entry into service demonstrated that the MOD had not taken it on board that it required an attitudinal change in project management. Failure to integrate into the process the services that will be using the equipment, and the industry that builds and supplies that equipment, means that the process of delivering military capability will be incomplete.

Another key to achieving the aims of smart acquisition is developing a mature partnership with industry, with both sides working together from a project's inception through to the completion of its service life. Government and industry need to be honest with each other on costs, capability and time issues. I agree with the Minister. This is not simply a matter for the Government; industry has a role to play here. It involves setting achievable budgets and in-service dates. If the Government set a budget that is too low simply to gain Treasury approval, or industry gave a low estimate in order to win a contract, the result would be escalating costs later in the process. Equally, if for political reasons the Government set an unrealistic in-service date and industry accepted such an estimate, the result would be time slippages.

However, recent experience tells us that such a relationship is not yet developing. Despite what the Minister said, there have been repeated reports of difficulties between BAE Systems and the MOD. In their extraordinary rejection of the Defence Committee report, the Government said:

> "It was remarkable that no mention of any kind is made of industries performance—the Committee suggests that all the faults appear to lie with the DPA."

I partly agree with that. On the other hand, the Committee was right to point out that it is incumbent on the customer to work with industry. Again, I agree with what the Minister said earlier in reply to the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) about providing a clear programme of stability for industry in so far as that is compatible with the requirements of the Treasury. But that has now become an imperative. We can no longer continue with peaks and troughs in the British defence industry.

The Minister knows that there is a fantastic warship building programme. The question is whether we have the skills to undertake that programme. We have feast or famine, and we cannot go on like that. If we are to maintain a defence industrial base in this country, we must find a way to even out that stream of income for business, something to which the Conservative party is absolutely committed.

Mr. Burnett: I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that if the ordering process were more orderly, it would retain competition, because having one supplier and one customer is unlikely to be in the best interests of the taxpayer.

Mr. Howarth: Yes, of course. We were the architects of the introduction of extensive competition into defence procurement, which resulted in a considerable saving for the British taxpayer and a sharpening-up of British industry. We must also face the fact that the defence industrial base is contracting not only in this country but around Europe and in the United States. We must also address security of supply.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman discussed how the Conservative Government increased competition, but does he remember that he closed Swans, an excellent naval yard, which reduced competition?

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) has confirmed that the hon. Lady is a magnificent woman and we all welcome her contribution. Of course, we closed various things when we were in government, and this Government have closed things. The point is that we must have an adult debate. The world has moved on.

The Minister told the Select Committee that he seeks the answer to the question: which essential capabilities does this country require? We understand that point and are doing our own work to see whether common ground exists or whether we disagree on the capabilities that it is necessary to retain in the United Kingdom. Given the contracting defence industrial base, we must address the essential issues. I hope that I have made our policy clear: we believe that it is essential to work with industry and to even out the peaks and troughs so that we can retain the skills base in the United Kingdom to ensure that essential capability is maintained.

I do not want to take too long on individual projects, but the Minister inevitably raised Typhoon. He mentioned that the Royal Air Force is pleased with the product, and I endorse that view. The last Conservative Government started the Typhoon project, and it is a fantastic bit of kit. I look forward to seeing it at close quarters, when I introduce its delights to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex. I hope that we shall manage a flight in it—my hon. Friend did not know that.

This time last year, we were told that a decision was expected on tranche 2 of Typhoon by Christmas. We still expect a decision on tranche 2 by Christmas—unfortunately it will be Christmas 2004 rather than Christmas 2003. Will the Minister give the House an assurance that the Government expect to sign off tranche 2 by the end of the year? If the contract is not signed by the end of the year, what plans does he have to introduce some form of bridge funding to ensure the maintenance of the skills base, particularly among the sub-contractors, an issue to which I have just referred?

We have consistently called for the second tranche of Typhoon to be adapted to a ground attack role and hope that that project will now proceed. I understand that design work is at an advanced stage, but we must know when it will be finalised and how confident the Minister is that the new systems integration work has been satisfactorily concluded and de-risked.

When will the new variant enter service? The Defence Committee concluded:

> "We are concerned that there appears to be a wide disagreement between the MoD and industry on how much the necessary enhancements will cost. We find it surprising that MoD considers that there will be little impact on the total cost of the programme, unless there are plans to reduce the size of the third Tranche."

I am not inviting the Minister to comment on the third tranche, but I ask him to comment on that particular point. The Government response to the report suggested that the Committee was confused. Will he tell us what the planned enhancement programme is all about and how it differs from the ground attack variant?

Hon. Members will remember that the MOD originally expected to award FRES—the unfortunately named future rapid effects system, which is medium-weight battlefield equipment—to Alvis Vickers, Britain's major land system manufacturer. Ministers later backtracked from their initial position and dismissed out of hand a joint proposal last year by BAE, Alvis and Thales to work with the MOD to develop that project. So much for the partnership with industry. Months passed while the MOD was reviewing its procurement strategy.

Later, the Government announced their intention to establish a systems house to reassess the entire project, adding at least another year to the process. The Minister appointed W S Atkins to undertake the assessment phase. When does he expect it to be completed? In a recent interview in Jane's Defence Weekly, the chief of defence procurement, when discussing the FRES project, stated:

> "we are not going to sign up to any in-service-date, any capability or cost until we understand what the customer wants".

I agree with the de-risking, but the assessment has gone on for such a long time that the gestation period is approaching A400M proportions.

The CDP's statement would be fair, were it not for the fact that Ministers had already set an in-service date of 2009, which subsequently slipped to 2010. The Minister cast doubt on the achievability of that in-service date in a written answer last month to my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton), who inquired about the introduction of an assessment phase:

> "Part of this Assessment Phase work will be to identify and reduce risk in the programme to enable us to define an appropriate In-Service-Date."—[Official Report, 4 October 2004; Vol. 424, c. 1874W.]

Will the Minister stick by 2010?

Can the Minister tell us how much he has set aside for the FRES project, which the Chief of the General Staff, General Sir Mike Jackson, regards as absolutely essential? There has been some speculation that the programme's lifetime cost could be as much as £50 billion on top of the initial £6 billion figure. Again, we would welcome clarification from the Minister on that point. It is little wonder that a senior infantry officer was quoted in The Daily Telegraph on 2 October as saying that the FRES programme had turned into "a debacle".

On the question whether the programme will be collaborative, the Minister confirmed in a written answer to me on 19 October that a collaborative solution is a possibility. What work is going on? Will we collaborate with our European partners or the United States, which has a similar programme under way? We must be told the parameters within which the Government are operating.

The record is not happy on collaboration with our European partners. The Minister abandoned Tracer and the multi-role armoured vehicle, both of which were collaborative programmes. Having abandoned those programmes, is there any sense in going down another collaborative route? The answer is in the Minister's hands, and I would be grateful if he explained it.

Serious questions remain over the future of the project to design and build the carriers. First, the Government announced that they wanted the MOD to take a risk-sharing part in the programme, leading BAE's former chairman, Sir Richard Evans, to express the concern that the three-way alliance was developing into:

> "some sort of a procurement committee, chaired by a procurement officer from the Ministry of Defence who will have a balancing vote on the committee".

He was rightly concerned about where and with whom the responsibility for risks resides and whether a committee is the right decision-making body. Have those concerns, which were raised by one of the prime contractors in the carrier project, yet been attended to?

The decision to introduce a physical integrator for the carrier project represents little more than an added layer of bureaucracy on an already cumbersome project. As I said at Defence questions last Monday, the contract is not, as has been reported, for the management of the project, but rather it is the contract for the management of the contract for the management of the carrier project, which is extremely convoluted.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): Say that again.

Mr. Howarth: No, the Minister must do that.

On the joint combat aircraft, which was formerly known as the joint strike fighter, reports persist about continuing problems with the short take-off and vertical landing variant. Can the Minister confirm that the weight problems with the STOVL variant have been resolved? I understand that those problems have not been resolved, giving rise to concerns that the aircraft will carry only two 1,000 lb bombs instead of the planned 2,000 lb bombs. As Jane's Defence Weekly put it:

> "the requirement has now been made to fit the aircraft, instead of the other way around".

Are the Government prepared to accept that reduced payload?

Doubts have also been cast on the viability of the STOVL variant. Tom Fillingham of BAE told Jane's Defence Weekly:

> "STOVL is not set in stone. Right now our current planning is for STOVL but we don't have a contract."

A decision to abandon the STOVL variant would mean the new carriers being fitted with catapults to launch conventional aircraft. When does the Minister expect to make that decision, and what effect would the need to change the JCA requirement have on the cost of the carrier programme and on that aircraft project itself?

I do not want to speak for too much longer, because I know that many hon. Members want to contribute to the debate. The Minister mentioned the international traffic in arms regulations waiver. I agree with him that progress has been slow, although I attach no blame to Ministers, because Lord Bach has batted as hard as anybody. We are all indebted to Senator John Warner of the Senate armed services committee for his work on behalf of Anglo-American relations in trying to drive through a solution in Congress, where the real problem lies, to benefit the United Kingdom and the United States.

We are indebted to the Senator for at least having got into the Appropriations Bill a specific undertaking that the United States Government will ensure that the United Kingdom's applications for the export of technology are expedited—whatever that means. I fear, though, that it is not enough. The Secretary of State said in a letter to the US Defence Secretary on 16 June:

> "The mutual operational, technological and industrial benefits we have enjoyed over the years of co-operation could quickly evaporate, with both of us being losers and with obvious political ramifications."

I think that he is right.

My own view is that progress will remain slow unless the Prime Minister seeks to extract some dividend for the phenomenal support that he has given President Bush over the past few years. It is the very least that the United States can do. This is not an intemperate criticism of the US Administration. However, the fact is that we are partners, and the Prime Minister deserves some dividend for his support. The Minister is more aware than I of the damage that the Prime Minister has incurred from his own side. One dividend should be to get the ITAR waiver—which, I remind the House, concerns unclassified information. We are not asking for classified stuff—well, we are, but we are not getting it—yet we cannot even get an agreement enforced on unclassified material. The Prime Minister deserves that.

I turn to Galileo, the EU's proposed competitor to the US's free-to-users global positioning system, which provides aeronautical and motor car navigation systems—although more advanced Members no doubt have SatNav in their BMWs.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): Correct.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend is nothing if not fully conversant with the most up-to-date and modern technical gizmos. With an hour's briefing, I am sure that he will be able to fly the Typhoon.

The Galileo project represents a potential source of growing transatlantic discord. It has serious military potential. Ministers insist that they will resist any attempt by France to give Galileo a military application. On 7 June, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), told European Standing Committee A that it > "would not be used for operational military matters."—[Official Report, European Standing Committee A, 7 June 2004; c. 6.]

Is that also the intention of the MOD?

Furthermore, the Minister will have seen last weekend's article by Christopher Booker in The Sunday Telegraph, which referred to a discussion at the Royal United Services Institute on 11 October when the question was posed whether, in the event of a conflict involving the US, the EU would agree to deny Galileo facilities to America's enemies. I understand that that is the case, as I have been told in a letter from Astrium. At that meeting, when EU officials replied that they would not be prepared to turn it off, US officials unsurprisingly responded that in such circumstances the US would be forced either to jam the Galileo signal or destroy Galileo's satellites.

There is a further cause of concern in that China has been admitted to the project as an equity partner. It will therefore have access not only to Galileo's facilities but to the technology, and is reported to have said that it will resist any US attempt to deny access to Galileo—whatever that means. These are extremely serious issues on which the country is entitled to know the views of the MOD, as well as the Department for Transport.

There are, of course, aspects of defence policy with which we agree, and we recognise that there are real difficulties with which the Government and their Ministers have to wrestle. However, they have chosen to deploy Britain's armed forces more frequently and in greater numbers than for decades. It is their duty to ensure that the men and women of our armed forces have the right equipment and that they sustain Britain's defence industrial base to ensure that we have security of supply. We believe that the overwhelming evidence is that they are failing to deliver. Their failure to invest in research will have deeply damaging consequences for Britain's defence industrial base in years to come, their reliance on new technology gizmos at the expense of numbers of tanks, ships and aircraft will expose our armed forces to real risk, and their inability to manage the procurement process has proved costly to an already stretched defence budget.

It is time for a new Government—a Conservative Government—who are committed to ensuring that our armed forces go into combat properly trained and equipped. That is what our superbly courageous and professional armed forces need, and that is what I hope that the people of Britain will ensure next year that they get.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I remind the House that Mr. Speaker has placed a 15-minute limit on all Back-Bench speeches, and that applies from now on.

2.55 pm

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South) (Lab): I came to the Chamber with three speeches. Plan A, if the Conservatives were forgetful of their failures over the years, was to repeat my classic A to Z of Tory procurement foul-ups. The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) almost forced me to do so. Plan B was a run-of-the-mill speech on defence procurement. I am well able to give run-of-the-mill speeches, but I resisted that temptation. Plan C was what I would say if the Minister attacked the Defence Committee. So it is going to be plan C.

The Defence Committee's report on defence procurement was published at the end of July. It received considerable press coverage, although not as much as the Ministry of Defence's riposte, which was a little over the top. Having read it, I was reminded of the famous quotation of Robert E. Lee, who once said:

> "I was too weak to defend, so I attacked."

I shall therefore try to explain our motives and purposes.

In fairness, the extent of the current defence procurement programme and budget is formidable in terms of ensuring that our armed forces are among the best in the world. The cost of the top 20 projects for 2002–03 was in excess of £50 billion. I am very pleased about that. We have already heard about the joint strike fighter and Typhoon. In our much maligned report, we listed the top 20 projects; it is an impressive list. We welcomed the fact that the Government are spending more on defence. I do not believe the figures cited by the hon. Member for Aldershot. The Government are giving procurement a great deal of attention. Much of what they have done is to be supported, and we did so in our report.

The procurement of high-tech, cutting-edge equipment is not easy, but lessons from the past need to be learned and acted on. Some of our previous reports pointed to the risks if equipment programmes are not managed properly. Those reports go back years. I have been on the Defence Committee since 1980, and we have produced endless critiques of the defence procurement process. In our report on the strategic defence review, we discussed the major inquiries—the Gibb-Zuckerman in 1961, Downey in the mid-60s, and Levene in the mid-80s—and looked into smart procurement. Those were all serious attempts to do something that we have never done as a country—to produce defence equipment effectively, on time, and to cost.

We are still striving for that, and progress has been made. In our highly-criticised report, we said that the system is not yet succeeding—indeed, there have been several failures. The report was based on our own methodology. We have a full-time member of staff seconded from the National Audit Office, we undertake an annual review of the defence procurement process, and we read the NAO material and all sorts of documentation. Many of our criticisms came from the chief of defence procurement. How can we be criticised for citing the senior guy in the procurement process apart from the Minister? That is indefensible.

We pointed out that the top 20 defence procurement projects for 2002–03 had experienced in-year cost increases totalling £3.1 billion and that those projects had slipped a further 18 months beyond their expected delivery date, with nine months' slippage occurring in 2002–03. However, the report highlighted several good things, including the successful de-risking of the 2087 sonar radar project—2087 is not the projected in-service date. We complimented the decision to extend the assessment phase of the future carrier programme and the second tranche of the Eurofighter Typhoon aircraft to multi-role.

Despite claims to the contrary by the MOD, this was a fair report. We welcomed the fact that the MOD had recognised the importance of establishing an industrial strategy to sit alongside a defence industrial policy. We said that the decision to procure a Hawk trainer aircraft was sensible. However, we have a key role in examining expenditure, administration and policy, and we do that on behalf of the taxpayer. It is not our job to be a cheerleader for the MOD and to ignore poor performance where it occurs.

The Government's response, published in October, called our endeavours "misguided, disappointing and flawed". It accused the Defence Committee of being selective in its use of evidence and said that it had missed an opportunity to be constructive. What did we say? First, the performance of the Defence Procurement Agency in 2002–03 was "woeful". That was a slight mistake. The Clerk could not read my handwriting. I wrote, "The performance of the Defence Procurement Agency was wonderful." He is on his first written notice, and he had better learn how to read my writing. Secondly, we said that

> "our armed forces have been let down by the organisation tasked with equipping them."

We also said that the MOD had only recently taken action to improve performance on major projects and that a fear culture existed in the DPA. The Government's response, it is fair to say, did not accept those specific conclusions.

I intend to respond to some of the more extreme claims made in the Government's response in due course, but first I want to highlight the fact that in a number of areas the response agreed with what we were doing. The hon. Member for Aldershot, a good personal friend, despite his politics—he claims that he is to the left of me, but I deny it—commented on the ITAR waiver. He will remember that we lobbied very hard against the "buy American" Act, and for the ITAR waiver and the helicopter sale for the President, so we have been helping the MOD as far as we can.

The Government's response welcomed a number of the Committee's other conclusions, some of which were highly critical. When the Government introduced smart acquisition, their objective was to procure equipment faster, cheaper and better. The Committee welcomed that initiative and looked forward to the expected improvements. Some of those improvements have been obvious; others have not.

In addition to the poor headline performance figures for 2002–03, the most disappointing findings from our inquiry were the evidence provided by the chief of defence procurement, Sir Peter Spencer, head of the DPA. Sir Peter had commissioned an independent review of the DPA, referred to by the Minister, and specifically of the implementation of the smart procurement initiative. He told us in an evidence session that the findings from the review included the following: the underlying causes of poor performance were endemic; only one of the seven key principles underlying smart procurement had been implemented in full; there was a misunderstanding throughout the MOD as to what project leaders were expected to deliver; and some of the projects that had commenced following the introduction of the smart acquisition process were showing signs of problems.

If those were the findings of Conservative Central Office, we would quite rightly dismiss them, but they were the result of a report commissioned by the MOD. We are castigated for echoing some of those points. If we were selective in our evidence, as the MOD claimed, it is because we drew on the evidence provided by the head of the DPA, part of the MOD, and the findings of an inquiry commissioned by the MOD. Why are we considered to be the aberration? Why are others trying to be difficult with the MOD?

I shall give a few quotes. The first states:

> "Cost overruns of £3 billion and delays of nine months on average on major defence projects during a single year is a poor performance. Our servicemen and women will be without the equipment promised, and will have to continue to use older kit planned to be withdrawn . . . The Department must properly apply the sound principles of smart acquisition".

Where did that come from? It came from the Public Accounts Committee's comments on the major projects report. It gets all its information from the National Audit Office. The second quote states:

> "The Agency . . . failed to achieve its targets on programme slippage and cost growth . . . overall performance was seriously damaged by major cost and time delays".

Was that the Defence Committee? Was it The Daily Telegraph? No, it is the foreword to the DPA's annual report and accounts 2002–03.

One more quote:

> "People were so excited about smart acquisition delivering more for their money that they got over-optimistic . . . People want to believe their own publicity and think they can get it for the cost they first thought of before they had done any of the reconnaissance and then you get a slightly unholy alliance of optimism".

Who said that? Was it the hon. Member for Aldershot? No, it was the chief of defence procurement in an interview published last week in Jane's Defence Weekly.

Ms Dari Taylor: I am sure that my right hon. Friend remembers that I was a member of the Select Committee, under his chairmanship, when defence procurement was something that we were all discussing and becoming involved in. May I ask him whether he made any criticisms of it at the time? Frankly, I cannot remember him ever doing so. In fact, I remember that it was the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and I who made such criticisms, not my right hon. Friend.

Mr. George: I cannot go back as far as the idyllic days when my hon. Friend was a member of the Committee, but I will talk to her afterwards.

The Government's response suggested that the Committee should have highlighted the success of the procurement of items. We did, and in our "Lessons of Iraq" report we were in many ways very complimentary. The MOD attacked us as uninformed and disliked our conclusions, but those were based on solid evidence given to us.

The Committee concluded that a fear culture existed in the DPA. The Government disliked that intensely. Several pieces of evidence led us to our conclusion. Perhaps the most compelling was from the chief of defence procurement, who told us:

> "You have to ask yourself with some of these very big failures which occurred, why did they suddenly appear to come out of a clear blue sky? Somebody must have known".

He also told us:

> "We need to make sure that people give us honest forecasts. The worst way of getting out of this is simply to hoard up bad news until after you have gone and then somebody else comes along and uncovers it inside a project . . . We effectively had an amnesty to say 'If you have something you need to get off your chest, this is the year to do it.'"

[Mr. George]

Why would officials need an amnesty? What would prevent them from admitting that their programmes were experiencing problems? Fear? However, our conclusion was rejected by the MOD.

One of our industry witnesses also used the term "fear culture", and Vice-Admiral Sir Jeremy Blackham, former director of equipment capability—a dangerous outsider—spoke at a recent RUSI procurement conference, which I chaired, about procurement problems being prompted by > "the fear of failure outweighing the glare of glory".

Our report focused on the latest available data at the time on the performance of major defence projects. What about the procurement performance since then? In the DPA's annual report and accounts for 2003–04, published in October, the chief of defence procurement says that the agency failed to achieve its targets on programme slippage, cost growth and customer satisfaction. He added:

> "Failure to meet three key targets is incontrovertible evidence that the agency has yet to deliver the full benefits of the smart acquisition reforms introduced five years ago".

I could go on and on, but it is too painful.

My point is that things have gone right in many instances. The budget is going up and the programme set out by the Government to acquire weapons to equip our armed forces for the future is formidable and commendable. I admire what they have done. They are trying to achieve almost the impossible. Many previous Governments have failed in the task. The Government have begun the process and made progress but, unfortunately, failures have occurred. It is incumbent on the Defence Committee to point out those failures. If the Minister does not like the message, he should not shoot the messengers, because most of them are in the pay of the Ministry of Defence. I ask him to tell the person who wrote the document that slags us off that he should perhaps have approached us privately so that we could exchange views. We are trying to be constructive, not destructive.

The budget constraints are obvious, and we need to get the best equipment that we can afford. The Minister, his colleagues and I remain good friends. I have had my famous discussion with a nameless person and I emerged in one piece. We are on the same side. Even the Opposition are part of the process of considering how best to serve our armed forces with the money available. I hope that our comments, those of Ministry of Defence employees, and of internal mechanisms, can be acted on. I hope that lessons will be learned, without rancour or excessive anger. We can then collectively deliver to our armed forces the right amount of high-quality equipment that is good enough for them. They deserve the best and perhaps we can collectively help them to get the best equipment so that they can do what we ask of them.

3.11 pm

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): It is a privilege to follow the Chairman of the Select Committee and to agree with everything that he said, especially his last comments. The purpose of such debates is to try to ensure that we get to the bottom of all the matters that need discussion, not only for our armed forces, but for taxpayers, constituents and the country. We should be able to do that in a helpful and constructive, rather than a destructive, spirit.

A fortnight ago, we debated defence in the world, which clearly demonstrated our enormous current defence commitments, not least in Afghanistan and Iraq. In the context of Iraq, I want to comment on some "breaking news"—the phrase that appears on television screens. The Black Watch is apparently deploying to a larger geographical area. Although I do not have the exact details, I hope that the Minister will make a statement at the end of the debate. On 21 October, the Secretary of State said:

> "The deployment is limited in scope, time and space".—[Official Report, 21 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 1037.]

I hope that the breaking news does not contravene that, and that later we will understand what constitutes the enlargement of the geographical area.

I place on record again our admiration of and support for the bravery and professionalism of all our troops, especially in the difficult times that they are experiencing, leading up to what we all hope will be successful elections in Iraq in the new year. I am pleased that presidential elections, although they may not have been perfect, were held in Afghanistan. We wish President Karzai the very best in trying to take his country forward.

The annual opportunity to consider defence procurement policy provides us with the chance of considering individual high-profile projects. The two previous speakers have spent approximately an hour going through two aspects of those high-profile and costly projects. However, I hope that the debate also provides us with an opportunity to explore the changing strategic environment in which long-term decisions have to be made. The United Kingdom is—I suspect, not for the first time—at a crossroads in several matters, which will have a significant bearing on those decisions. I should like to consider them briefly.

The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) alluded to the first aspect, which is the relationship on foreign affairs and defence with the United States of America and the European Union. Without unnecessarily repeating the catalogue of events that led up to the conflict in Iraq, we must surely recognise that if we move ever closer to the USA in foreign policy, it will inevitably affect relationships with our European partners. It is also likely to determine the shape of our defence assets.

The necessity for compatibility with US equipment when fighting alongside each other is clear and obvious and such a policy has significant cost implications. Unless compatibility is also possible with our European partners, we face either expensive duplication or possible value for money integration. It would be ideal, as the Minister said in his opening speech, if we could harmonise in Europe and be compatible with the USA. I am not clear about whether that will be possible on a medium and long-term basis.

Secondly, procurement spending appears increasingly polarised between expensive technology and what might be considered low-tech personnel numbers. As greater technological advances are made in our weapons and communications equipment, it is tempting and seductive to believe that fewer fighting troops are necessary. Yet is clear that, although impressive technology was able to win the brief war in Iraq, the lack of troops on the ground to patrol the borders and secure arms dumps, vital oil installations and other infrastructure dramatically changed military planning. We need both, and expenditure and focus on one should not compromise the provision of the other.

Thirdly, I want to consider the importance of the UK defence industry. Again, much has been said about that with which I agree. Its importance in security of supply and economic value to the UK cannot be overestimated, yet we must ensure that our armed forces get the best possible equipment and that the taxpayer gets value for money. As the Chairman of the Select Committee pointed out, those decisions are sometimes incredibly complex and difficult. We do not criticise to make a point—we acknowledge that decisions are difficult—but we want to try to understand all the parameters.

Mr. Davidson: The hon. Gentleman says that there are difficult decisions. Will he disown the comments of the Liberal Democrat Lord Garden, who recently said that he wanted the order for aircraft carriers to be placed in the United States and the aircraft carriers to be built in Norfolk, Virginia?

Mr. Breed: I was not aware of that and I hope that the aircraft carriers will be built here. There is every hope that that will happen. However, it would be interesting to examine the cost comparisons so that we understood the issues. Sometimes the definitions of value for money—and the definitions in general—are not sufficiently broad. When I read the report, it took me a while to understand the term "de-risking". I believed that it meant to get rid of risk, but it means risk assessment. Why use "de-risk" to mean risk assessment? I worked in an industry that considered risk and reward all the time. It is not possible to remove all risk but we can try to assess some risk and make cost comparisons.

Mr. Ingram: If the cost comparator said that it was cheaper to build abroad, would that become Liberal policy?

Mr. Breed: Decisions would not be made purely on cost comparisons. We must acknowledge that value for money contains far more elements than the actual cost of building a vessel. If, as I understand it, the life span is 50 years, that will have all sorts of implications for the economy, and so on. There is no reason why we cannot be honest and mature enough to examine how much production might cost in different places, and to consider the benefits.

Such objectives sometimes seem incompatible. I do not believe that they are, but our instinct must be to buy British where possible. Because of globalisation, however, the necessity of joint ventures and the scale of some defence programmes, the international defence industry is shrinking in terms of the number of companies involved, particularly with the capacity to undertake such programmes. With the huge US defence budget and the nationalistic calls from American politicians to buy only American, it will be more difficult to maintain an independent UK defence industry. The Government have indicated that they do not consider ownership of a company important provided that it remains based in the UK, with all the employment opportunities and with some safeguards for intellectual property rights. I do not take that view, as I believe that joint ventures as well as mergers and acquisitions provide Trojan horses, which could by stealth appropriate the component parts of our defence industry.

This brings me to the last of my crossroads concerns—research and development, which has been touched on in previous contributions. The Government have rightly indicated that the UK's future economic fortune lies in knowledge-based industries at the heart of which is research and development. There are three vital elements to successful research and development in any field, but they are perhaps most important in defence: a supply of highly intelligent and motivated people; considerable financial resources; and an appropriate Government policy. It is interesting to note from today's newspaper that seven of the top 10 universities in the world are American, and perhaps we ought to congratulate Oxford and Cambridge on being the only two UK universities in the top 10. As regards funding, the vast majority of venture capital funds now available for R and D are located in the USA. And the enormous programme of public expenditure by the US Government provides an attractive background to R and D projects, allied to a most attractive corporate taxation policy to encourage R and D in companies at all levels.

We are rightly concerned about the admissions policy of our universities, and hon. Members have engaged in all kinds of debates recently on that. While we are debating, however, American universities are scouring the world and Europe in particular to offer attractive packages to the very best students, with the prospect of US citizenship at the end. In no way do I present this scenario as an anti-American rant, but as a recognition of the USA's clear, co-ordinated policies to assemble a defence industry that has the capability for significant domination in the foreseeable future. It is therefore vital for us to recognise that our procurement policies will have to take into account those realities. I hope that that gives my view in terms of work that may go out of this country to the USA in particular.

I want to turn to a few current concerns. Mention has already been made of the Astute submarine programme, and especially the delays that have been experienced. I have recently been made aware of the operational vulnerability of our existing Trafalgar class submarines. I understand that HMS Torbay and HMS Tireless have been withdrawn from service and are undergoing further expert assessment at Devonport. I readily pay tribute to the highest safety standards that are adopted at Devonport when dealing with our nuclear-powered submarine fleet. Clearly, safety is of the utmost importance not only to those who sail on those ships but to those who do the work at Devonport. It places inevitable strains on the existing submarine fleet if replacements are delayed, however, and we are likely to experience technological difficulties in ships that are probably among the most complex pieces of machinery in the world today. Increasingly, lengthy delays will be experienced, exposing some of the problems with replacements. If the Minister cannot provide clarification of the current situation of those two submarines in Devonport in his wind-up, I would be grateful if he could write to me.

As we have indicated previously, we wholeheartedly support the carrier programme and would welcome the Minister's confirmation of the current situation. Reference has already been made to that. In an intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) mentioned the Military Afloat Reach and Sustainability project in an attempt to understand the thinking of the MOD in respect of the MARS and carrier programmes, as it appears that they are inextricably linked. If our warship yards cannot cope with the construction of eight to 10 ships for the MARS programme at the same time as the construction of aircraft carriers, we would like some understanding of the thinking on how to tackle that programme. If they can be constructed at the same time as carriers, in this country, I would be only too pleased to hear it.

Finally, I want to refer to the results of the MOD internal survey, which was published only a few months ago. I hope that the Minister agrees that it provides some alarming figures. Two thirds of those questioned are spending their own money on extra equipment because they do not have confidence in the MOD issue, and nearly half our soldiers in Iraq have no confidence in their fighting kit. Furthermore, a constituent of one of my hon. Friends who is the mother of a Royal Marine serving in Iraq at the moment has advised me that the Marines cannot operate effectively at night because there are only eight pairs of night-sight goggles for a total of 800 men. That seems extraordinary and I would therefore welcome the Minister's comments.

The same survey revealed that 39 per cent. of soldiers do not feel valued by the Army and that 35 per cent. felt that morale was very low. When asked, "Does the MOD look after its personnel?", only 3 per cent. of respondents strongly agreed, and 32 per cent. somewhat agreed, leaving 62 per cent. who either did not know or did not believe that the MOD looked after its staff. Furthermore, 35 per cent. of soldiers were critical of the frequency of the operation of tours, while 87 per cent. of the RAF said that they were overstretched, with 20 per cent. working more than 50 hours a week. I hope that the Minister at least finds those figures as worrying as I do, and will seek to address some of the underlying problems. Again, I would be appreciative of his views in his wind-up.

I think that it is agreed across the House—at least I hope so—that we need to ensure that our forces have the best and most effective equipment, and yet it is clear from the survey that that does not seem to be the case. I readily accept that no one can provide everything without reference to cost, but in the total sum game, the amount spent as a proportion of total expenditure on basic kit and basic equipment cannot be large. I would hope that some reprioritising of expenditure, bearing in mind the huge costs of some of the big-ticket items mentioned this afternoon, can be made so that we can at least ensure that no member of the armed forces would feel compelled to purchase additional kit with their own hard-earned cash in order to feel more confident in the dangerous situations to which we send them.

Mr. David Crausby (Bolton, North-East) (Lab): I shall begin by making the obvious statement that it is undeniable that our armed forces deserve—indeed, must have—the very best equipment and support services available. They are, after all, men and women who risk life and limb in our defence on an increasingly regular basis. Whenever there is a conflict between the safety of our troops and buying British, we must have no hesitation in coming down on the side of protecting our brave servicemen and women. Cost is obviously an important issue, but we would be wise to take a sensibly balanced view in the procurement process, so as to deliver a secure supply of defence-related products and services in the long and medium term.

The safety of our forces notwithstanding, the most secure and dependable supply is, of course, a local supply, manufactured and delivered by the UK in the UK. The end of the cold war has completely changed western defence priorities, and the globalisation of the industry has put enormous strain on both defence manufacturers and the trade unions. The trade unions have dealt with and accepted enormous numbers of job losses over recent years, and defence manufacturers, for their part, have continued to invest, in spite of difficult trading conditions.

Despite this revolution in the industry, the UK has been able to maintain its position as the world's second largest defence supplier; and so we ought to be, as we are, after all, the world's second largest defence importer as well. This is not just a one-way process, with UK manufacturers demanding more of the defence budget. The size of the budget is in many ways dictated by the size of our industry and its ability to produce. As the British defence supply chain declines, the temptation to cut the budget will increase.

The UK's defence industry is one of which we should be enormously proud. While I accept the Minister's comment that without the MOD there would not be a British shipbuilding industry, I must point out that without the British shipbuilding industry there would not be an MOD—or, indeed, a British nation, other than one that might well be French or Spanish-speaking. This is very much a two-way process. The UK defence industry is world-class, and it should be valued in the same way as we value our armed forces themselves. It contains irreplaceable talents and skills, and it is vital to our independent ability to protect ourselves and our nation.

The UK has the most open defence market in the world, but our openness to others is not always reciprocated. Does anyone really believe, for example, that the French would allow us to build their aircraft carriers, or the Chinese would dress their soldiers in Lancashire cotton? I doubt very much that either of those things could happen.

The defence industrial policy launched in October 2002 was an important step in the right direction, but it was long overdue. The order for Hawk trainer jets was secured only at a very late stage, after some very serious arm-twisting. Sir Richard Evans, the then chairman of BAE Systems, told the Defence Committee that the recommendation from the Defence Procurement Agency was to acquire the Italian Aermacchi aircraft rather than the British Hawk, and that in coming to that recommendation no account had been taken of the additional value to the UK of purchasing the Hawk. He went on to say that the Indian Government had placed an order for 66 Hawks only after the British Government's eventual decision to buy British, and that he could genuinely see us being able to sell 400 to 500 such aircraft worldwide. Well, we shall see, but one thing is absolutely certain: none of that would be possible without the MOD order. After all, who would expect the Indian Government to buy the Hawk if the British Government had not been prepared to?

The eventual decision by the Secretary of State to secure the Hawk trainer was a brave and sensible one that was obviously made in Britain's interests, and I suppose that this example demonstrates the success of the defence industrial policy in the end. Why, though, did he have to make the decision at such a late stage? One of the six overarching themes of defence industrial policy is maximising economic benefit to the UK from defence expenditure. The Americans do not appear to be so reticent in protecting their manufacturing base. They are not quite as enthusiastic as we are about being fair and open to foreign competition. That is clearly demonstrated by their reluctance to grant even an unclassified waiver of the international traffic in arms regulations to the UK, which is disgraceful. I greatly appreciated the Minister's robust comments on the waiver in his opening speech, and we strongly support his efforts to overturn the decision.

America's argument in favour of the regulations is that it should not export its technology to the industries of untrustworthy countries. That is understandable, but Canada has done so and enjoys free trade with the United States. The question is, who will George Bush turn to first when he needs a reliable military ally—Canada or the UK? There is an urgent need for the President to deliver on the ITAR waiver. The White House has no excuses now that the Republicans are clearly in control. Failure to deliver will inevitably damage our special relationship. Without full access, we are entitled to ask why we should stick our neck out in support of the United States if it does not trust us with its technology. The denial of the waiver delivers a huge and unfair advantage to American companies.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): I agree with what the hon. Gentleman is saying about ITAR, but the question that must be asked—perhaps he knows the answer—is whether the Prime Minister has asked that favour of the US Government, and if so, what the response from his friend George Bush was.

Mr. Crausby: The Prime Minister has not confided in me personally, but my understanding is that the White House is very much in favour of the waiver, and support from the President is there. The problem lies with Congress, and people such as Congressman Hunter. My point is that as we move into a second and strong presidential term, the President should redouble his efforts to ensure that Congress delivers. As I have said, the lack of a waiver gives American companies an unfair advantage. Not only are there obvious commercial difficulties in having to license thousands of individual components, but delays could make effective competition virtually impossible.

Increasingly, UK companies are trying to get around American protectionism by buying up US companies. Therein lies another problem. Many of our major enterprises are forced to employ nearly as many workers in the US as in the UK. If we do not halt that drift, Britain will rapidly become the low-tech end of the business, completely reliant on other countries and their Governments. If that is coupled with the purchase by overseas companies of UK defence manufacturers, we could end up with just the unskilled and outdated end of the business.

The globalisation of high-tech manufacturing is of course inevitable. With a level playing field, the British defence industry can compete with anyone in the world; but defence industrial policy must ensure that the UK has maximum exposure to new technologies. British taxpayers and British politicians will be best persuaded to invest in defence when they can see that the wealth of our nation benefits as a result.

3.39 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to follow my Defence Committee colleague, the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby). Of course, our thoughts today are with our armed forces, many of whom are being put at risk on our behalf. Our objective is to contribute to the discussion in order to ensure that they have the best possible equipment available to them.

The facts have been rehearsed by several hon. Members. The 20 largest projects in defence procurement cost £51.9 billion—a massive sum—excluding the two most sensitive, which are not recorded. In 2002–03, some £3.7 billion-worth of defence equipment was delivered, but there was a slippage—an increase in cost—of £3.1 billion. Looked at in one way, that means that we are scarcely making any progress at all. There was a 6 per cent. increase in costs and an 18-month slippage in programmes. Nine months of that slippage occurred in the last year, so in that time only three months of real progress was being made. Moreover, although the Defence Procurement Agency said that it expected to spend 15 per cent. of programme costs on investment in de-risking, only 5 per cent. was actually spent. So the smart procurement initiative—now known as smart acquisition—aim of "faster, cheaper, better" is not being met.

With the possible exception of Ministers, we all enjoyed very much the speech of the right hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George), Chairman of the Defence Committee, in which he robustly defended the Committee's report. It was accurate in every case, and every allegation and statement can be fully justified. The Government's description of it as "disappointing and flawed" is completely incorrect. I take part in this debate with relish, and I am happy to associate myself with some of the more critical sections of the report. It is not a habit in this House for a Member to be identified with a particular phrase in a report, but I am proud to be associated with some of this report's more robust language.

We have to ask ourselves what has gone wrong. How can it be that a respected Committee's report can describe the programme as "woeful", which indeed it was? Smart procurement was introduced some six years ago, and it is highly charged with management consultant-speak. My background is in business, and I used to have ministerial responsibility for economic development in Northern Ireland—I was responsible for the privatisations of Harland and Wolff and of Short Brothers—so I do not regard myself as completely ingenuous when it comes to business matters. However, even though I listened carefully for about an hour when I attended my first smart procurement presentation many years ago, I did not really understand what those present were talking about. The presentation was completely suffused with management consultant-speak. Ordinary, normal people find it difficult to tune into such language, which was full of "main-gates" and special technical phrases. One needed a dictionary to understand what was being said.

We have reached the stage where the director of defence procurement is offering an amnesty for honest forecasts, and there is a gap in targets. For example, the Ministry of Defence says that there is a 50 per cent. likelihood of a target being met in five years, whereas the DPA is talking about a 90 per cent. certainty of meeting a target in six years—so they are not even talking about the same targets. Every project has to jump through the same hoops, and as so often with this Government, they have created a set of artificial targets and are spending an inordinate amount of money and time trying to meet them. Exactly the same thing is happening in the national health service. The Defence Committee Chairman, whose speech I am trying to develop, said that things have gone wrong; I am trying to work out why.

In the NHS, micro-management has resulted in the Government setting targets in order to decide whether a hospital should get stars. They set targets for waiting times in accident and emergency units, for example. I know that my own local hospital had to work for weeks in advance to build up to its target week when it would be checked for its accident and emergency times. Having reached the target, it wound down from there. Doctors' leave was cancelled in order to meet the target in the particular week, but it was subsequently restored. Having to meet the target distorted the work of the hospital for months.

Exactly the same is happening in defence procurement. The Defence Procurement Agency sets artificial targets and people have to meet them rather than the interests of efficiency. The way ahead must be to develop a team of trained service personnel who have experience within the armed forces. They can move over to the procurement field when they have built up service experience.

The Defence Committee provides a similar sort of analysis in paragraph 14 on page 47 of its report:

> "MoD estimates that Smart Acquisition has resulted in savings of £2 billion. However, given that the Chief of Defence Procurement has acknowledged that only one of the seven principles of Smart Acquisition has been implemented, we have no confidence in the reliability of this estimate."

These are the key words:

> "Indeed, the programme of Smart Acquisition was created and named by government, but does not necessarily define the ultimate standards in defence procurement. Success in defence procurement should be measured by objective standards and not just by reference to the seven principles that the MoD has itself adopted."

Smart acquisition has at its kernel the point that a task is de-risked at the beginning, but how can we de-risk a project? Let us take the example of the two huge new aircraft carriers, which we all fervently hope will eventually materialise. How do we decide whether the joint strike fighter, with its short take-off and vertical landing role, will be able to meet its requirements? We all know that there is a significant weight risk with the VSTOL joint strike fighter, but how can we possibly work out whether the technical problems will be overcome, and how can any commercial manufacturing company be prepared to take the risk of the project not working properly? It simply does not work. The Public Accounts Committee made the point that it is unreasonable to expect commercial companies to bear the risk, however much study is put into the project at the beginning.

The only way ahead is to have a trained team of people. Having spoken to a wide range of people in the armed forces over a long period, I would submit that people involved in defence procurement need to have military, hands-on, armed services experience. We need to work in the long term to build up a team of trained and suitably qualified people from the outset and give them hands-on military experience for, shall we say, 10 or 12 years. At the age of, shall we say, 32 to 35 at the rank of, shall we say, major, these people would move over and take over long-term procurement projects. The long term is important: we cannot expect people to pick up a full understanding of major projects in a short period.

The concept of drafting in Army, Navy and Air Force personnel for the standard billet of two and a half to three years and expecting them to be able to pick up and run with the ball is just not realistic. We need a cadre of people, perhaps comparable to the old Royal Corps of Naval Constructors. They usually had services experience before they moved in to become professional experts in their particular fields. I urge the Government to go down that road, to develop a cadre of trained people and then to trust them. We cannot second-guess them all the time; we must put them in position and let them manage. I would maintain that the besetting fault of this Government in particular, and of socialism generally, is that they love micro-management and believe that everything can be controlled from the centre.

I want to make three more brief points. First, we should enhance co-operation with other nations. If the chairman of British Airways said that he wanted aircraft to be designed to his specifications, we would all think that he had gone barking mad and that the company would go out of business. However, the Army, the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force all have equipment specially designed for them, and the same is true in France, Germany and most other countries.

Governments are protectionist when it comes to defence procurement, and hon. Members, who have the interests of their constituents at heart, are also naturally protectionist in that respect. However, we must steel ourselves to recognise that procurement is not a job creation scheme. Adopting more long-term thinking about defence procurement means that we will work more closely with other nations. In that way, the cost to taxpayers will be reduced, and defence forces will receive equipment that is the most cost-effective possible.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I understand my hon. Friend's rationale, but is not one of the difficulties with collaborative programmes the fact that, on average, they are some 40 per cent. more expensive? That is a result of the collaborative element. The difficulty lies in trying to harmonise common requirements without compromising on the capability that is aimed for, and in banging together heads in Europe in an attempt to keep the costs down.

Mr. Viggers: My hon. Friend is right to say that collaborative projects are more expensive. That is why we must be much more strategic in our thinking, so that one country takes the lead in developing a tank, for example, while another takes the lead in developing a ship, and another in developing an aircraft. However, that would require a level of statesmanship that is not evident anywhere in Europe, or even in the UK.

Secondly, I want to say a word about the carrier programme, about which I am less sanguine than my colleagues on the Defence Committee or in the House. There is a yawning gap between the £2.9 billion that the Government say the ships can be built for, and the £4 billion that the manufacturers say is the absolute minimum. The Government started by setting up a competition between BAE Systems and Thales, and then announced that there would not be a competition after all. Input was forthcoming from VT, which has a great deal to offer, and from Swan Hunter, which has very little. Now we have an alliance—effectively, a committee made up of representatives from BAE Systems and Thales, with a Defence Procurement Agency chairman. We are told that it is not a committee, but if it is not that, what is it?

Ms Dari Taylor: Did the hon. Gentleman really say that Swan Hunter had little to offer when it came to building the aircraft carrier? If so, will he explain exactly what he meant?

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Lady will know that Swan Hunter almost went out of business before it was pulled back from the grave. I may be putting myself in a position that resembles the one encountered by my hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson), and I may have to make a journey to the north-east, but I stand by what I said. There is widespread apprehension in the shipbuilding industry as a whole that Swan Hunter is being included because of jobs and not because of skills. I do not resile from that statement.

My third and final point concerns the need for open markets in defence products. The UK is the nearest thing to an open market in Europe in that respect, but we must work more with colleagues to encourage the US to give us the international traffic on arms regulations waiver that we need so much. The VT group has suggested a new industry-Government approach to secure greater access to global defence markets, which would also be very welcome, but the ITAR waiver is crucial.

To be fair to the Prime Minister, I understand that No. 10 and the White House issued a joint statement after a meeting between him and President Bush. The statement said that they had agreed > "radically to improve the sharing of defence information and technology between our two countries."

The US Administration have therefore supported a waiver for the UK, but the problem lies with Congress. We must hope that the new profile of the membership of Congress will help, as we urgently need to ensure that we can maintain a good defence dialogue, in technological terms, with our American allies.

3.54 pm

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): It is always a privilege to follow the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers). I do not always agree with what he says, but his speeches are always a good listen, with occasional thought-provoking ideas. This is an important debate, especially after the announcement on the White Paper and yet another transformation in our armed forces.

I often think that defence procurement and logistics are the poor relations, but they are in fact some of the most important aspects of defence policy. If we advocate serious change but do not get right procurement of equipment and the logistical support for that equipment, we will be in serious trouble. People can wish for effects-based defence or for capability, but they will not get it if procurement and logistical support are not got right. As I have said before, although it is often forgotten, almost half the defence budget is spent, not on equipment or front-line capability, but on supporting that equipment and front-line capability. The House does not get the chance to debate that aspect of defence policy enough.

My comments today are made as a loyal supporter of the Government's defence policy, which has been a huge success since we were first elected in 1997. Like the hon. Gentleman and indeed you, Madam Deputy Speaker, I have had the honour to represent Parliament on the NATO Parliamentary Assembly for some years. I have also been a member of the sub-committee of that assembly on future military capability, and I have been proud to observe the role that British defence policy—especially the strategic defence review—has played in transforming defence, not only in this country, but in other NATO countries. I do not know whether hon. Members are aware that all the countries that have undertaken a strategic defence review, including Norway, Germany, Spain and many former Warsaw pact countries—the latter through their military action plans—have referred to the British strategic defence review as a basis for considering transformation.

I was present when the former Supreme Allied Commander Europe, General Wesley Clark, held up a copy of the British strategic defence review and told other NATO countries that that was how it should be done. The SDR has been a great success story. Indeed, I have a spare copy, for anyone who is interested, of the Spanish defence review, which pays particular tribute to the British review. In fact the only country in Europe to undertake a defence review recently without paying tribute to the British role is France. Hon. Members may not be surprised to learn that.

[Mr. John Smith]

I welcome the speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George). All hon. Members should read the Defence Committee's report carefully, and it would be a mistake for the Government to ignore what it says. We have done well in formulating our vision and in the reconfiguration of our forces to meet future challenges, but I sense a drift in the Ministry of Defence on issues of procurement and logistical support. The Defence Committee report should be welcomed by Front Benchers as a warning shot across the bows. There are problems developing in the Department and now is the time to do something about them, while we still can. In that way, we can build on the excellent start that we have made with our smart procurement and smart acquisition policies.

Mr. Caplin: The Ministry has no intention of suggesting that we do not understand the points made by the Defence Committee—I will say more about that later—or that we are not willing to learn lessons. We have proved over the years that we are willing to do so. However, some of the language used in the report was not properly evidenced. That is where the disagreement has occurred between the Defence Committee and the Ministry.

Mr. Smith: I am delighted with the assurance that my hon. Friend gives us in that intervention, but I still have deep concerns about trends in the Department.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that procurement—whether for Typhoon, Hawk or the A400M—has been very good under the Government, but the big problem, especially in respect of British textiles, is that uniforms are being made in China by a red army company? I am sure that he would agree that that is absolutely absurd and should not be allowed to happen.

Mr. Smith: I am not familiar enough with the issues to be able to comment on them—I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister is and will take every opportunity to do so—but I take the point that was made earlier; what we want for our servicemen and women, who do such a wonderful job for us throughout the world, is the best equipment at the best price. That occasionally involves making tough decisions.

I want to spend the time left to me throwing up a case that reflects my concerns about developments in the DPA and the Defence Logistics Organisation that have been flagged up already in the Defence Committee report. I refer to the announcement on 16 September of the Minister of State's preferred option to hand back the entire deep repair and maintenance of the RAF's premium front-line fleet of Tornado GR4s to the RAF. I am talking not about servicing in theatre, first-line servicing or minor repairs to keep those aircraft in the air, but factory maintenance. Major repair and overhaul is being taken away from the Defence Aviation Repair Agency.

I commend the report produced by the Defence Committee in March 2001 that heralded the creation of that agency as a great innovation, as part of the strategic defence review as it relates to smart procurement. DARA was created by Her Majesty's Government in April 2001, as an alternative competitive source of aircraft repair to that offered by the commercial, private sector. It has a major strategic role in ensuring that our front-line fleet is kept in the air at the right price, so that we get value for money.

The RAF used to carry out deep repair and maintenance—in fact, it did so in my constituency for 40-odd years—but not because it could deliver front-line capability better, more cost-effectively or more efficiently than business, but because there was a very good military case for doing so during the cold war. Since the end of the cold war, no one—none of the NATO countries, nor any of those who produced strategic defence reviews—believes that there is any military or economic case for the RAF to carry out deep support for our fast jets on the front line.

Only the declaration of a preferred option has been announced, but I am deeply concerned that, if pursued, it will result in capability failures and a dependence on a monopoly source of support for the RAF, and that a well-known defence contractor—I shall not name it, but I am sure that those on the Front Bench are aware of it—will be relied on to bail out the RAF in the future, as it has had to do in the past. If the fully commercialised civilian capability that exists is taken out of DARA, the RAF will have no one else to turn to. I draw the House's attention to the recent comments of the Public Accounts Committee when it interviewed Sir Kevin Tebbit about the Ministry of Defence's constant failure to avoid being dependent on a monopoly supplier; that is exactly what is happening.

The decision is bizarre, but it reflects the drift that is occurring in the DPA and the DLO. I am absolutely delighted that the Defence Committee has decided to investigate the preferred option before the decision is taken, rather than after the recommendation is implemented and the capability is lost for ever.

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Gentleman knows that I am with him in spirit because St. Athan in his constituency carries out parallel work to Fleetlands in my constituency, which undertakes the overhaul of rotary wing aircraft. Does he agree that the Government's proposal flies in the face of most logic? If one can take manufacturing and overhaul facilities away from the uniformed armed forces, one can reduce costs and increase efficiency.

Mr. Smith: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. If one does that, one can enhance front-line capability at the same time.

It was right to carry out a review of logistics. An end-to-end review of logistics in land and air was carried out in 2002–03, which was precisely when the Defence Committee suggested that serious problems were occurring. I recommend that hon. Members read the review. Its recommendations were completely flawed because they ignored the strategic role that was created for DARA as little as three years ago by the Government. Secondly, and crucially, a proper distinction was not drawn between the productivity, output and potential of servicemen and women operating in a factory environment under a military code and Queen's regulations, and those of civilians working in a factory in a commercial environment. They were treated as the same, but that beggars belief because it goes completely against common sense.

I am mindful of what the hon. Member for Gosport said about the dangers of management speak because earlier this year, the Minister of State rolled forward the maintenance of the Harrier GR9 to Marham. We were told that that happened because service personnel had developed a lean technology and a pulse line and that they could thus compete with the private sector; what utter nonsense. They are not there to compete with the private sector, but to prepare for and fight wars. They are the best in the world at doing that, so for goodness' sake, let them get on with that and stop pretending that they are businesses and that they should be running factories, precisely the nonsense that is proposed.

The move to Marham was not a success. The so-called lean machine has been fraught with problems. The Minister has asked me on several occasions to list some of the problems and provide him with the information, but I do not wish to do that in the House today. I have a long list of aircraft that have experienced difficulties in recent months, but I shall put only one example on record: Zulu Delta 402. Will the Minister seek an independent assessment of what went wrong with the aircraft and why it took 219 days to turn it around, rather than the 60 that it should have taken? The reason for that is obvious. Those people are loyal servicemen and women who joined the Royal Air Force, as I did many years ago, to serve their country, not to work in a factory or to behave as commercial civilian factory workers.

The decision is a disaster for the military in terms of its capability and for the British taxpayer, because we will pay through the nose for it. When we are dependent on that monopoly supplier, there will be no way out. The supplier will be able to ask for blank cheques. It was little wonder that the supplier was pleased when I recently spoke to it about the prospects of the new partnership and new relationship. There is still time to do something about that, however.

If the decision were right for our military and the taxpayer, I would go to my constituents, who are very experienced—in the Minister's words, uttered within the past 12 months, they are world-beaters—in defence aviation repair, and say that in the interests of the defence of this country we have to bite the bullet, take the tough decision and find ways to minimise the impact, but that is not the case. The decision is bad for the military, the taxpayer and the aviation industry in south Wales. It is wrong in principle and wrong in practice.

I ask my right hon. Friend to reconsider the decision. The end-to-end review was flawed. It took place within months of the creation of the Defence Aviation Repair Agency. The RAF was not happy about the agency in the first place and, surprise, surprise, the review's recommendation is to give the work back to the RAF. If he cannot see that, it is a matter for concern, which is why I am delighted that the Defence Committee will investigate the issue shortly.

Please do not get this decision wrong. It is not a question of jobs in my constituency. It is not even a question of the damaging effect that it will have on the south Wales economy. It is a question of the future capability of the British Royal Air Force. We cannot place that at risk.

4.12 pm

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): In following the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith), may I say that I am glad that he implicitly acknowledged the excellent work in the private sector by the many thousands of my constituents at BAE Systems Warton, who produced the Tornado mid-life update and the GR4 model as a result of that? I have noted his comments, which will not be lost on those aerospace workers.

I want to pick up a theme of the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby), who made a perceptive and interesting speech, touching on many of the challenges that lie ahead in securing the future for Britain's high-technology defence industries, particularly in the aerospace sector. The House knows that the home of BAE Systems is in my constituency, and it is to that that I want specifically to address my remarks.

Although I found much in the Minister of State's speech that was interesting, I was disappointed with the number of omissions relating to specific projects. I appreciate that he cannot cover everything, but we are embarking on taking our place in the construction of the joint strike fighter project. It is the world's biggest military aerospace project. Some 230 of our personnel are in Dallas Fort Worth. I think that I can claim to be the first British politician to visit that plant, to have a presentation on the JSF, to see the future for myself and to talk to some of our excellent people who are contributing to that project. However, the Minister made no specific detailed mention of the future of that project and the implications of that for Britain's aerospace industry.

On the future offensive air system—the cradle of the development of the new technologies that will equip our industry for the future—the Minister told me in a written answer that since 1999 we have spent £84 million on that project, subsumed as it is into the European technology acquisition programme. But there was no mention in his speech of what the project is currently about, what technologies are involved and when we can expect some public exposure of the projects that will arise from it. In the parliamentary question I asked for a statement on the future offensive air systems project, including the project's objectives. We got two lines on arguably the most important programme that will determine our future aerospace industry technologies.

The debate has touched briefly on the Eurofighter Typhoon. I take the opportunity to put on record my personal appreciation for the courtesy and kindness that the Minister for Defence Procurement, the noble Lord Bach has shown in personal discussion and correspondence in response to the many letters of representation that I have sent on the subject of tranche 2. The discussions between the company and the Ministry of Defence about the difficulties of the cost of the second tranche and the implications for the cost structure of tranche 1 appear to have been successfully concluded. May we please have a straight answer to the question as to when an announcement will be made? This has been run out for far too long. It is nearly a year since those of us with an interest started asking when the matter would be sorted.

[Mr. Michael Jack]

I say this not for any kind of political gain. I recently had a constituency advice bureau in BAE Systems and, one after another, members of the work force came to me and said, "Mr. Jack, when is this going to be settled? When will we know that we have some future for our work at Warton and Samlesbury?" I acknowledge that the Minister must have a meeting with the other three partner countries before the matter can be finally decided, but he owes it to those workers to give them an early Christmas present and put the future of tranche 2 once and for all beyond doubt.

The language on Eurofighter Typhoon has become noticeably more positive from the Secretary of State and all Ministers and from the Chief of the Air Staff. I welcome that endorsement. It will certainly help prospects for export orders in the discussions that are going on with the Greeks and the Malays, for example, and perhaps even future orders for Saudi. More confidence among export customers would be welcome, but the biggest vote of confidence would be the signing of tranche 2. Perhaps in his winding-up speech the Minister will put us all out of our—I will not say misery, but anticipation.

Mr. Ingram indicated dissent.

Mr. Jack: The Minister says no, and that will be noted. Many thousands of workers would have liked an answer, which they will not receive tonight.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: My understanding is that our European partners are awaiting a decision from the United Kingdom. They are all ready to go. I understand from BAE Systems that the price has been agreed with the Government. What is the hold-up? My right hon. Friend is right to say that the Minister must give us an answer today.

Mr. Jack: I agree. My hon. Friend underscores my point.

I should be grateful if the Minister explained why pen has not yet been put to paper on the subject of the Hawk order for the RAF. The hon. Member for Bolton, North-East rightly emphasised the importance of the United Kingdom's decision to purchase that aircraft, yet I understand that the plane has not yet been ordered. A decision in principle has been made, but it would helpful to know when the order will be placed.

Another notable omission from the Minister's speech was the Nimrod MRA4. That may be, from the Minister's point of view, in the "All too difficult" column, but let us spend a moment reviewing MRA4 and its importance to the UK aerospace industry. It is currently the largest British aircraft project. In fact, it is the only large British aircraft project in construction. I would be the first to acknowledge that the birth of MRA4, representing as it does nearly 95 per cent. of a brand-new aircraft, has not been painless. There are huge lessons to be learned from the way the procurement exercise was undertaken, but with the successful flight of the first prototype from Woodford to Warton in my constituency, we know the aircraft will fly. We know also that two other prototypes studying the mission system are under construction at Woodford.

This aircraft is a world-beater. Its mission system, which Boeing has helped us to develop, is the envy of the world. A fair chunk of what Boeing has done is going into the American P3 replacement aircraft. It has, for example, a 14-hour loiter capability, one of the largest bomb bays of any military aircraft in the world, and the latest acoustic suite and electronic surveillance systems. It is one of the best aircraft of its type and yet it was not mentioned specifically in the Minister's speech. It is of crucial importance to the aerospace industry, with 1,500 workers at BAE Systems at Woodford, Warton and Brough combined involved in it. There are 2,000 more in the supply base, and many small and medium-sized enterprises depend on it. So far, the most that the Government have said is that they need, or think they need, approximately 12 of these aircraft to carry out the capabilities of the existing fleet of Nimrod patrol aircraft.

Given the investment that the Government and the company have put into the project, it merited at least a mention in the Minister's speech to give us some indication of how the Government will take forward the future assessment of the project and when, if ever, they will decide to buy more than one, two or three. I do not know, but in terms of the future of our maritime patrol capability, and possibly, as it is a world-beater, even selling the aircraft to others, we should at least have had a mention of it in his speech.

I had the rather surreal experience in the middle of September of standing in the middle of the joint strike fighter factory in Lockheed Martin at Dallas Fort Worth. That aircraft plant is over a mile long. It is the home of the F-16 and the F-22, as well as now of the F-35. The reason why it was odd to be standing there was that I was having a discussion with representatives of 230 of our own aerospace workers who were there. They were admired for their skills and they told me how impressed the Americans were by our engineering capability. They said that the Americans were in awe of the fact that when British-made components came together, they fitted. There were no shims, no adjustments, no nothing. They did what it said on the outside of the can. They talked about their contribution, but then they said that they had already put their technological jewels on the table and that that was what had got them into the joint strike fighter project. They asked what was the future of the British aerospace industry, where were the new technologies coming from, and what would keep the skilled teams of engineers and systems designers together. The most that we have heard on that score in the Minister's speech today is that he welcomed the desire to secure a long-term future for the aerospace industry, or words to that effect, and he muttered something about the defence industrial strategy.

I welcome the fact that there is a much better dialogue between BAE Systems and the Government. In fairness, there is both listening and discussion. But unless that exercise, combined with the work of the future offensive air system project is to mean anything, we must have a clear statement first, that the Government regard the aerospace industry in the same way that they do shipbuilding. Shipbuilding is on their list of strategic capabilities that they feel that the UK should have. That lines up, as I understand it, with nuclear weapons, nuclear propulsion and encryption. But aerospace does not currently figure on the list of strategic defence capabilities that we should maintain in this country.

I can see, from having seen the size of Lockheed Martin's plant at Dallas Fort Worth, that we will never be able to rival the might of the American defence industry. But, to pick up on the points made by the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East, we have world-beating capabilities that should in future put us at any table, anywhere in the world where there is a project of partnership that would be to the advantage of the United Kingdom.

The Government must now state with greater clarity what they are doing to develop new technologies. What are the new technologies? What work are the Government doing in the materials development field? Which new electronic systems and manufacturing systems will they support? After Eurofighter-Typhoon and other current projects, we will not have an industry.

In conclusion, I turn to the JSF. I wholly endorse all that has been said in this debate about technology transfer and welcome the efforts on the ITAR waiver, but now is the time for the Prime Minister to call in the cards. I know from my discussions with the Foreign Secretary and a question that I put to the Prime Minister in the House that they take seriously the discussion about that matter with President Bush. As America's most loyal ally, it is time for America to come to our aid and make certain that meaningful discussions to evaluate the RAND Europe report on the JSF in Europe are pursued.

I say that because the report offers the prospect of a final assembly and check-out line for the up-to-150 aircraft in which the Government have an interest. There is certainly the prospect of a maintenance and repair unit for those aircraft in this country, which is a necessity. In addition to servicing, such a unit could also undertake lucrative upgrades over the aircraft's potential 20-year lifespan.

The production run in the United States could exceed 2,800 planes, and when I visited Dallas Fort Worth, Lockheed Martin indicated that it might be subject to supply constraints. If that is the case, it is incumbent on the Government carefully to evaluate—perhaps on behalf of or in concert with other European countries which are interested in the aircraft—the possibility of locating the final assembly and check-out facility in the United Kingdom, hopefully at Warton. A facility to deal with maintenance and repair makes eminent sense in the long term. If technology transfer does not occur, however, all the possibilities for British industry and the JSF identified in the Government-funded RAND Europe report will not happen, because we will not get the required technologies.

The JSF is a vital project and we have embedded our best technology to date in it. Given that we may want to develop the aircraft in the future, I back the attempts to achieve technology transfer. However, I hope that the Government will indicate whether they will engage in meaningful discussions with the United States about the long-term planning for that aircraft.

I have briefly covered the major procurement projects that matter to BAE workers, not only in my constituency but across the north-west and throughout the country. Unless long-term decisions are taken in the context of the future offensive air system about where Britain's military aerospace industry is going when the JSF has been built, the Eurofighter has been delivered and decisions have been taken about the Nimrod MRA4, we will not have a meaningful aerospace industry in this country, which is totally unacceptable in military and, indeed, economic terms.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): I take great pleasure in having an opportunity to contribute to today's debate, which I have enjoyed.

Appropriately, I shall start with the 2004 spending review. Although all hon. Members are concerned about how much we are spending and how effectively we are spending it, it is also important to remember that we are spending. The defence budget will increase by some £3.7 billion over the next three years, which is something to be satisfied with. I say to the Minister that I will always want more, but I am pleased that the Government have put the money up front.

We should acknowledge that the average real terms increase in spending of 1.4 per cent. a year, building on the additional investment in defence in the 2000 and 2002 spending reviews, gives us a sense of satisfaction and security. We are putting our money where it is required to achieve the best equipment and kit for our armed forces. That represents seven consecutive years of planned, real-terms growth—the longest period of sustained growth in planned defence spending for more than 20 years. That is a record of which to be proud.

My knowledge of defence and the defence industry started with my membership of the Select Committee on Defence, which represented a tremendously valuable opportunity for me. During that period, I met many of our troops serving in the Balkans, in Kosovo and in parts of Europe where they were playing high-quality, creative and professional roles. I was never more proud than when I met them in Banja Luka and they explained how they were helping to maintain peace. To be honest, I often felt that I would love to be a member of the armed forces. My back went straight and I was always wanting to stand to attention, because although what they were delivering was not known about or acknowledged by many people in Great Britain, it was superb in terms of what it achieved.

I felt the same when I met our armed forces as members of NATO involved in partnership for peace. They were committed to involving others in working together in partnership better to deliver change and to understand one another, and working together better to achieve a peaceful Europe. That was very pleasing.

As we are talking about procurement, I shall lean on the fact that I was Parliamentary Private Secretary to my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) when he was Minister with responsibility for veterans—that was a tremendous experience—and to Lord Bach, Minister for Defence Procurement. That gave me a keen insight into the Royal Navy. That was not because they wear the smartest uniforms, although they do—many hon. Members have teased me about that—but because of the way in which they deliver a service. Through the Defence Committee, I gained knowledge of Portsmouth, Plymouth and Barrow, as well as keeping a sure and clear eye on my own River Tees and River Tyne.

I was staggered when the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) told the House that Swan Hunter had won the contract to build part of the aircraft carrier merely to provide it with work. That was a straightforward insult, and I hope that he will have the decency to come to the House to withdraw it. I had to ask him to repeat it because I could not believe it the first time. Swan's has 100 years of experience and a reputation as an excellent builder of naval ships. I got to know the men—the boilermakers and engineers—there when I worked in trade unions in the northern region. Whenever I went to Portsmouth or Plymouth or to parts of the world where commercial contracts were being put together, I was proud that men from the north-east regularly made themselves known to me. They were often in the majority among the construction force. Let nobody in this House say that we won the contract in order to provide jobs. I am not trying to fool anybody—of course I want jobs so that my community can work—but I would not want a contract for the Royal Navy to be built by sub-standard people, as was implied by the hon. Member for Gosport.

Mr. Davidson: Does my hon. Friend agree that the hon. Gentleman made it even worse by suggesting that he might have to follow the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) up north, not realising that the hon. Member for Henley went to Liverpool, which is in the north-west, while Swan Hunter is in the north-east. Does not that explain why the Tories have only a small band of support on the south coast?

Ms Taylor: My hon. Friend knows that I could not agree more.

When Swan Hunter won the contract for the two auxiliary landing ships logistics, I was delighted. I was thrilled to watch the construction process, with its expert shipbuilding and engineering competence. When the first ship was launched, everyone, including the Royal Navy, said, "Look, Dari,"—they did not call me "the hon. Member"—"this is not high-tech kit," but to my eyes it was an excellent piece of engineering. It was expertly made and totally dependable; it was launched on time, and it was made to price. To my way of thinking, all those are qualities.

I want now to bring a problem to the attention of my Front-Bench colleagues. I hope that they will be sympathetic to what I am saying. Swan Hunter is now building the second logistics ship. Construction should have started three months before it did. I believe that production is catching up and that the ship will be launched in 2005, but I want my Front-Bench colleagues to acknowledge the following problem. During the building of the first logistics ship, the Royal Navy decided that it wanted greater electronic competence and better technology, so the design had to be rethought for the second ship. The designers had to go back to the drawing board, and that took time. Inevitably, time is money. If the Royal Navy wants better, more and different, that is exactly what we should be producing and delivering, but the straight fact is that it will cost. I do not know which one of the hon. Members present is prepared to stand up and say, "We should have the lesser design because it was cheaper and it was done on time." I most certainly will not be making that statement.

The new landing ship dock logistics, or LSD—an unfortunate acronym—will be launched in spring 2005. I have no illusions about my competence to understand the changes that the Royal Navy required, but I do know that I support its determination to achieve the best. We in this House should determine likewise and spend accordingly. I do not want anyone to be under the illusion that I expect there to be an open chequebook, but when the Royal Navy can explain why and how the costs have increased, we are honour bound to accept that.

My next point has to do with the maintenance of a competent manufacturing industry, which is a difficult and expensive achievement. We must understand that investment in equipment is astoundingly expensive. I want to put a problem to my Front-Bench colleagues. The second logistics ship is, as I said, to be launched next spring. We know that, justly, Swan Hunter has won the contract to build 25 per cent. of the aircraft carrier, but all the suggestions are that the date for that project has slipped. It could be 2006; it might be later. That is seriously problematic for a shipbuilding industry that is costly in terms of its skilled work force and the equipment that it uses.

I cannot complain about that: the design of the carriers has to be right, and if the project takes longer, we have to cope with that. However, we also have to be sympathetic to the manufacturer, who cannot have kit lying idle or watch the people whom he has trained disappear into the ether. How would he get that trained work force back again quickly and effectively—a work force whom we trust to build the carrier? I have a suggestion for Ministers. It is not that I want the Department always to build on time—that is not always possible—but I want it to acknowledge that there are alternatives when that is not possible. I want to suggest such an alternative.

The Royal Fleet Auxiliary Service needs new oil tankers. I do not believe that that is a secret—the whole House probably knows that. New oil tankers are necessary because the single-hull tanker is being decommissioned for appropriate reasons. We can rebuild or put in a second, additional hull lining. Both options mean good work. I want to persuade my Front-Bench colleagues that the contract should go to a British yard. Of course, I want it. The hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) is smiling because he knows jolly well what I am about to say: I want the contract to come to the north-east and I shall lobby and exert pressure for it. However, I especially want Ministers to understand that we have a responsibility to support a competent defence manufacturing base. It also has a responsibility to look for new products, diversify and ensure that it is looking for commercial opportunities.

I hope that Ministers would not consider giving the tankers to Holland or the Ukraine to build. Again, I make it clear that I understand that those places could build cheaper—the industry's estimate is £2 million cheaper—but the cost to us would be clear in many other ways.

Mr. Jack: Does the hon. Lady agree that the north-east has the potential to offer another service to the Ministry of Defence? If any existing Royal Navy vessels need to be scrapped, a proper and environmentally friendly facility for dismantling them could be built, possibly in Hartlepool or other north-east sites, using the expertise to which she adverts.

Ms Taylor: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman. The northern defence industry is keen to press its competence to decommission in an environmentally friendly way. Not only Hartlepool but the Tyne faces much opposition. Both rivers have the competence and I hope that Ministers are listening because it is crucial to keep that manufacturing base.

I have spoken about the right of the Royal Navy to change the specifications if it believes that to be appropriate. We should support that. I have asked the Department to consider the way in which we can bring product forward to support the defence manufacturing industry when that is feasible. I know that hon. Members want building to be done to cost and on time, but I want us to build the best so that our armed forces have the best.

The debate has been good and robust. We have challenged each other and we are clearly thinking about a complex part of defence. I started by complimenting my Front Benchers and I shall end by doing that because it is valuable and important. They made it clear that they believed that they could cut waste. They believed that they could make savings. We all watched and wondered how and if. I am delighted to read a report that states that the pledge to make £2 billion of savings over 10 years has already been met. The Department is hitting its targets. It is spending good money and minimising waste. I simply ask my hon. Friends for one more thing—to ensure that any slippage is acknowledged and stopped and, when possible, to support our defence manufacturing industry. It is precious to us all and the last thing we want to see damaged.

4.44 pm

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor), who made a passionate and interesting speech. She conveyed to the House her love of men in uniform—the armed forces—and her stalwart support for constituency interests. Although I will not follow her comments, except in one respect, I was impressed by her interest in and love of the armed forces and defence. I mused, as I listened to and watched her, on how interesting it would have been to hear a speech on defence from her 20 years ago. It might have been a case of then and now with regard to her views, but given her background before she came to the House, perhaps she had not had the same experience that she has had since of meeting our armed forces in the field, which may have influenced her.

The part of the hon. Lady's speech that I would like to follow is that which she devoted correctly to her constituency interest. That is what I would like to do briefly today. My constituency has for many years been associated with defence procurement. In 1987, there were five Marconi companies in the constituency. It still has a Marconi company—Marconi Selenia—but because of changes in defence procurement, a global economy and rising costs, there have been changes in the ownership and composition of some other companies that remain in my constituency such as e2v and BAE Systems, which, having taken over some of the Marconi empire, has a manufacturing presence there. Chelmsford has expertise and experience dating back many years because it is the home of Marconi. We have a close interest in defence procurement, and rely on it for jobs and the sustainability of the local economy. We are proud of the town's contribution over many years to supplying our armed forces with highly skilled, highly technical equipment, and to supplying armed forces and commercial, non-military companies and establishments around the world with first-class equipment.

I want to ask the Minister four questions, to which I hope he will respond, if not in his wind-up, because of pressure of time, then in writing as soon as conveniently possible. The nature of defence companies has changed rapidly because of the massive costs of research and development for new equipment. Much more international co-operation has developed between companies seeking to produce the finest equipment that armed forces need. As a result, there is concern in my constituency, which my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) shares, about the need for clarification of the Government's view on giving defence contracts to companies that may be part of an amalgamation or conglomeration that is not exclusively British-based. As the Minister will know, the Government's defence industrial policy states:

> "The UK defence industry should be defined in terms of where the technology is created, where the skills and the intellectual property reside, where jobs are created and sustained, and where the investment is made."

First, on that basis, are the Government more concerned about investment in and growth of UK defence industries than the ultimate ownership of a defence supplier?

Secondly, inward investment is clearly extremely important for the future of the UK's defence industry. We need to move away from the issue of company ownership and focus instead on where jobs are created and how best the UK can attract more foreign investment. For instance, Finmeccanica is an Italian business, but its subsidiary, Marconi Selenia in my constituency, is a UK company that sustains high-quality jobs both at its sites in Chelmsford and Liverpool and through third-party relationships in the UK that support delivery of its contracts. So my second question to the Minister is: do the Government agree that creating and sustaining such jobs is essential in order to avoid a technology drain, in which such expertise is forced to leave the UK in search of jobs overseas?

Thirdly, the UK defence industry does not exist in isolation. Rather, it collaborates with European partners to identify procurement and third-party opportunities. Such an approach is naturally two-way, and by encouraging inward investment UK workers and businesses can continue to identify new opportunities for growth. So my third question to the Minister is: does the Government's policy on defence procurement take into account the need for ever greater collaboration so as to ensure the continued successful growth of the defence industry?

Fourthly, the UK's industrial capability and export ability are key to this debate. Companies such as Finmeccanica are well placed to exploit networks on behalf of the UK industry. For example, the global defence communications market sector is estimated to be worth about £500 million over the next 10 years, and it is essential that UK companies compete vigorously and successfully in this market. So my fourth and last question to the Minister is: what is the Government's stance on the need to increase the UK's export capability? It is crucial that British companies, either working alone or in collaboration with overseas companies, should have the ability to be at the sharp end of research and development, developing new technologies and products that will ensure that our armed forces have the finest, best and most appropriate equipment to enable them to continue to defend this country and protect our interests overseas.

These companies have gone through an extremely difficult time economically as world markets and the industry contracted very painfully, with far too many job losses and all the misery that that entails. It is important that they should now be given the opportunity to put the difficult times behind them and to move forward, so that they can thrive and look forward to a bright, successful future in which they have the ability to be innovative and entrepreneurial, both in our own national interest and for the purposes of inward investment, job creation and exports.

4.52 pm

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to take part in this important and interesting debate. I come to the debate having taken note of the Defence Committee's report, and as a member of the defence committee of the Western European Union. In September, the Committee met in Hengelo, in the Netherlands, to discuss defence procurement, and we looked at the issue from a pan-European and international perspective. The issues addressed at the meeting were extremely similar to those addressed by the Select Committee in its report and by the Public Accounts Committee in its recent report on major projects.

One of the main issues that the Committee sought to address was international collaboration in the defence industry. The view was that this has tended not to work very well. In shipbuilding, for example, good ships have been built in collaboration projects between European countries, but have cost about 25 per cent. more than they would if any country had built them alone. So it would seem that, even in collaboration between European countries, there is the same problem of cost overrun.

To address this problem, a European defence agency is in the process of being established, but it is important that there is a will for it to succeed. The point of the European defence agency is to ensure that there is sufficient capacity in Europe for national Governments to meet their own needs for defence and security, and for European needs to be met. But it is important to remember that decisions on defence have an impact on the economies of the individual countries involved. A nasty, cynical mind might think it would be all too easy for policies to be tilted to ensure a beneficial outcome for one country's defence industry. We must ensure, in all our wider interests, that that does not happen.

In the last few years, we have seen consolidation in the defence industries of both Europe and the United States. Key European players in defence say that we must not have "fortress Europe"; but it must be borne in mind that the defence industry is unique, in that it is a market whose customers are just about always Governments. Improving defence procurement will have an impact on the defence industry. In fact, it could be argued that improvements in the defence industry will bring about improvements in defence procurement. But the US accounts for nearly 40 per cent. of the world's defence spending, more than double that of the European Union—and it is worth remembering that great big China's proportion is only 6 per cent. The needs of the US will dominate the world's defence market, whether any of us like it or not.

As a result of action taken by the then US Defence Secretary, William Perry, we have seen a massive rationalisation of the US defence industry which has resulted in just five major airframe companies, three missile companies—down from nine or 10—two armoured vehicle land systems, and only three shipyards. Progress in Europe has been even slower. According to the head of marketing at BAE Systems, Sir Charles Masefield,

> "Firstly, the defence budget shown there of the combined European companies is only 115 billion, less than half the total annual US defence budget, in fact just 41 per cent. Instead of 5 airframe manufacturers chasing that greatly reduced budget, you can see we have 7, we have double the number of missile companies in Europe, we have three times the number of armoured vehicle companies in Europe, and we have nearly four times the number of shipyards."

In the US there has been a move to deliver the industry that delivers the economies of scale, to deliver an improved performance on procurement. We in Europe are much slower in achieving that.

There is, however, a danger that European defence industrial consolidation will result not in a better European industry able to compete and collaborate with large US companies, but in the "fortress Europe" that I mentioned earlier, in which preference will be given to European solutions for European requirements. Similar problems in the US could also damage defence procurement. The Defence Committee has expressed concern about that, saying:

> "A careful balance is needed, with the UK government using its influence in Europe to avoid any undue European-preference policy emerging while also playing a full part in rationalising the defence equipment market in Europe."

Ideally, in market terms, the US and Europe need an integrated marketplace. In a lecture in Rome 17 May 2001, Sir Charles Masefield of BAE Systems said:

> "But what about the transatlantic consolidation? I believe if you look at the US and European situation, we have of course as I've shown, the four mega companies in the United States, Boeing, > Lockheed, Raytheon and Northrop Grumman. We have in Europe, Finmeccanica, BAe, EADS and Thales. How are those going to play in the 10 years ahead? Well no-one knows but my guess is that this sort of thing will gradually happen and if we were to meet in this room in ten years' time, I wouldn't like to predict what would be the marriage in those global companies, but instead of 8 major defence companies in the world, I believe it is much more likely there will be 3 or maybe 4 . . . I believe each of those 3 or 4 will be transatlantic global companies, rather than either the United States or European companies."

One important piece of work for the European defence agency will be to look forward to how the different countries in Europe will be able to carry out their defence procurement in this kind of world. How will we meet the different requirements of the different countries in such a marketplace? In particular, how can we be sure that in a global marketplace UK defence procurement is driven by the requirements of the UK military, rather than just by what the large companies are willing to offer? I don't pretend to have any answers to those dilemmas now, but they are being discussed.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the defence White Paper allows the market to help drive the efficiencies to which she alludes, rather than creating a rigid policy under which national Governments would decide what the future of the defence industry in their countries should be?

Jane Griffiths: My hon. Friend makes a very sound intervention and he is absolutely right. That very point is being made, and it is contributing to the discussions that are taking place in what I hope is a positive way. It is well understood within the Western European Union, for example, that the UK invites competition in its defence procurement industry, while other states do not. That is an obvious difficulty, and hopefully, a body such as the European defence agency will play a part in opening things up.

I end with a very short story that shows the difficulties associated with truly opening up transatlantic defence procurement. The new helicopter for the newly re-elected US President is being built by AgustaWestland, mainly at its factory in Italy, which the WEU's defence committee visited last year. Because it will carry around the President of the United States, it has had to be called US101 to make it sound American.

5 pm

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths), who made a very thoughtful contribution. Unlike the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor), she did not assert an ambition to join the armed forces. I have had a pleasant few minutes to dwell on what would have happened had the hon. Member for Stockton, South been able to join my troop in 42 Commando. I do not know what line she would have followed, or what specialisation she was keen on.

I am concerned that there are some unanswered questions about defence procurement, and I want to begin by asking a few of them. Today is indeed the time to ask them, and I hope that the Minister will answer them when he winds up. I have an outstanding shipyard in my constituency, called Appledore, which still exists despite going into receivership last autumn. Earlier this year, the assets were bought by DML, and I am delighted that that happened. Before going into receivership, Appledore had some 600 employees plus 300 to 400 self-employed personnel working in the shipyard. Given that it provided jobs for more than 1,000 people, it was an extremely important employer—in my constituency, regionally, and indeed nationally. Its work force was outstanding, and it had a great reputation for its high skills. It competed in the commercial world for commercial orders, but it was not successful when it came to Ministry of Defence orders.

I was pleased that DML Plymouth bought Appledore's assets. DML is not solely reliant on the MOD for orders and work; it actively seeks and tenders for commercial orders worldwide. It now has a proven track record in the construction of super-yachts. Some are being built as we speak, and I hope that further yachts will be ordered in the near future. DML took on Appledore's superb design team of some 50 people straight away, and a further 50 are now employed on a super-yacht construction contract. So about 100 of the original 1,000-strong work force—only about one tenth—are re-engaged.

DML Appledore is currently competing in the MOD tender for the 1 Castle class offshore patrol vessel. Appledore has built a number of these vessels in the recent past for the Royal Navy—but only as sub-contractors—and also for the Irish navy. Its record is excellent. Vessels were constructed on time to a fixed cost, and to top quality. It also built the arctic survey ship HMS Scot on a sub-contract from BAE Systems. She has been at sea nearly every day since her construction, and every report that I hear is of her excellence.

DML itself has a turnover of some £500 million sterling a year, so we now have the financial muscle to compete for MOD orders. I point out to the Minister that neither DML nor Appledore has ever had a prime MOD contract for the construction of a Royal Navy ship.

If we win the OPV contract, a further 200 employees will be re-engaged for at least 18 months. Importantly, it will give the MOD a further shipyard to engage in the competitive tendering process—a shipyard that is used to competing in the commercial world where the competition is extremely tough, and a shipyard that understands that the future for British shipbuilding is to be in the forefront of technology, building sophisticated niche vessels.

On the role of competition in winning MOD orders, I have reason to be dubious, if not cynical, about the process. Three or four years ago, Appledore tendered for two alternate landing ships logistic. The order was won by the north-east—Swan Hunter, I believe—as the hon. Member for Stockton, South said. We took that on the chin, on the grounds of fair competition. A few months later, out of the blue and without any further tendering process, orders for two further vessels were placed at Govan, despite our numerous attempts. The only satisfactory explanation I can find for this order is that it was just in time for the Scottish elections.

My question to the Under-Secretary is this: how can a senior Cabinet Minister direct an MOD order, whether it be for construction or refitting, to be placed at a shipyard other than the one making the most competitive bid? Why cannot commercial confidentiality be lifted and full scrutiny allowed after the exchange of contracts and completion? Bidding itself is an increasingly expensive process and the inherent costs of the favoured lease-maintenance deals are extremely high.

Research and development, construction and maintenance are not the only costs that shipyards have to bear. On lease-maintenance deals, banks are always involved and they usually buy and lease. The banks will want to extract watertight indemnities as well as pick up capital allowances. Bank charges will be substantial; legal costs will be high. Documents such as leases, performance guarantees, collateral warranties and so forth have to be drafted and agreed. There is the risk to the shipbuilder of having to take the vessel back when the lease expires, often with very little residual value left. It is a complex process, very costly in management time, bank charges and professional fees. Do Ministers really believe that that is the best way to manage procurement and provide value for taxpayers' money? It is a question that I should like to hear answered when the Under-Secretary winds up the debate.

Along with other hon. Members, I recently attended a presentation given by BAE Systems at which that company suggested that shipbuilding companies should form what I would loosely call a consortium and bid as one for a future construction programme for the re-fleeting of the Royal Navy. The discussions are mainly taking place between Vosper Thorneycroft and BAE Systems, but I know that DML Appledore is also involved.

What are the main reasons behind the precipitation of the discussions? First, there is the over-reliance of many yards on MOD orders and, secondly, the abundance of new naval orders in the pipeline. I welcome that, but the Under-Secretary will have heard my intervention on the Minister of State earlier when he spoke about the programme, and the budgetary constraints are being evened out more than is apparent as we speak. What it would mean is that the MOD would effectively be the sole customer and the new consortium company the sole supplier. That is not a satisfactory state of affairs for the taxpayer or for the shipbuilding industry in the medium or long term when, as they surely will, the MOD orders dry up. I hope to hear what the Under-Secretary believes the medium and long-term solutions will be in respect of these matters.

Some of us are seriously concerned that important contracts are subject to undue influence by senior Ministers, and that the contracting process is unnecessarily complex and costly. When the Minister sums up, I hope that he will endeavour to allay our fears on these matters.

5.10 pm

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): I shall begin with a quotation:

> "The problem with building big carriers is that we haven't done it for 50 years and we want to do it here. If we really wanted big carriers they have a production line for them in Norfolk, Virginia. We could be buying American, rather than giving work to the shipyards in Britain."

That was said on "Sky News" on 28 July by Lord Garden, the Liberal Democrat spokesman on these matters in the House of Lords. I am glad that there is a clear division between the Liberal Democrat party and the Government as to where the carriers should be built. Among Labour Members, there is no doubt or equivocation that these carriers should be built in Britain.

The carriers form part of the biggest ordering pattern for some time. I very much welcome that, and the partnership developing between industry and Government in respect of ordering. It is important that we work towards avoiding boom and bust in the shipbuilding industry. I want to raise several matters with the Minister this evening. If he cannot answer them tonight, I hope that he will respond to me at a later stage, in my capacity as chairman of the parliamentary shipbuilding group.

How far has the MOD's maritime coherence study progressed? If it is complete, will it be made available to hon. Members? Also helpful would be an update on the discussions that have taken place between the MOD and the industry about bringing the industry together. What patterns and structures have been discussed? One of those hon. Members who represent Devon constituencies raised these matters earlier, but details of the MOD's view would be useful.

I have touched already on warship procurement in this country. It would be immensely helpful if we could have a clear and unequivocal statement from the Government that the MARS ships will be built in this country as well. Will the entire construction of those vessels take place in this country? Will the Minister assure the House that the MOD—or some forces within it—will not seek to have the hulls built abroad as part of a cost-saving exercise?

Most of us who have been involved in the industry for some time recognise that the distinction between hull construction and outfitting is now artificial. Vessels are designed to be built in modules, segments and sections, and that is much more efficient and cost-effective. It means that the hull is completed, followed by the other steelwork and then the rest of the outfitting. I hope that that point will be taken into account.

Will the Minister give an indication of when work will begin on the second batch of Type 45 destroyers? As I asked earlier, what efforts are being made to ensure that the design work on the new carrier is moved forward? I am aware that the supply of design work on Clydeside is rapidly running out and that a gap between the available work force and the work required is likely to become apparent in December. To avoid redundancies, the MOD needs to give the okay for some of the second batch design work to begin now. If highly skilled people in ship design are allowed to leave the industry, it will be very difficult to reassemble that work force later on.

Finally, I very much welcome the fact that work on the first of the Type 45 destroyers—HMS Daring and HMS Dauntless—is well under way. If that pattern is to be maintained, surely it would be logical to name the third ship, or a subsequent one, HMS Davidson?

5.14 pm

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): I shall be brief and refrain from discussing general manufacturing industry, except to make one point about the skills of welders and others at Swan Hunter. I propose that the House should consider inviting a welder from Swan Hunter to demonstrate the most creative way of welding the hon. Members for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) and for Henley (Mr. Johnson) together.

Our defence industrial policy recognises the vital importance of procurement to our industrial base in the UK and ensures that jobs, skills and exports are all fully considered in making procurement decisions. Does my hon. Friend the Minister agree or disagree with that statement? If he agrees with it, why has that policy not been applied to the clothing manufacturing sector? On what basis are decisions made on price rather than best value? On what basis do we not classify clothing as warlike? Are there any other EU countries that do not classify clothing as warlike? For example, do the French classify clothing as warlike—despite the fact that their army never appears to participate in many wars, unlike ours?

The large contracts that are being given out are, it could be suggested, ruinous to small and medium-sized enterprises. What cognisance has the MOD taken, in its procurement policy for clothing, of the Department of Trade and Industry policy on contracting with SMEs? What cognisance has been taken by the MOD of the ability of our domestic clothing manufacturing industry to compete in the future? How does our present policy sustain an environment that enhances competitiveness? That is one of the categories of defence industry policy. My hon. Friend the Minister may be unclear about the point that I am making, so I shall put it another way. Some British clothing companies will no longer produce clothing because they have lost contracts that they previously had. The new contracts are for five or 10 years, so how will British companies be able to tender for such work in the future? The industry will no longer exist. In other words, will the inadvertent result of present policy be that we will have to give all the work to overseas competitors?

The example of Cooneen has already been cited. I understand that that company is world famous for the manufacturing of wedding dresses and babywear. Has due diligence been exercised to ensure its capacity and capability to carry out a contract for the MOD? Is it the case that the company failed to register accounts in the last year, and if so, why? Was the red army factory No. 3533 in China part of the tender bid that the company put in or did it change its outsourcing, after it won the contract, from, say, Belgium to China? I presume that such issues as capacity and capability were considered in advance of the contract being awarded. We would not want to be in a situation in which actual fabric samples had not been provided. Were fabric samples provided from China or any other proposed outsourcing for that contract?

Finally, has there been any quantification of the loss of British jobs throughout the supply chain caused by such decision making? I ask that because the supply chain includes some of my constituents. Bassetlaw provides a disproportionately high number of new entrants to the armed forces. Next week, young people in my constituency will apply to join the armed forces, and I do not want the people who volunteer to join our armed services when there is conflict around the world to be equipped with second-rate, shoddy Chinese clothing, instead of British clothing, to do the job that they are paid to do.

5.20 pm

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): In the short time left to me, I want to concentrate on two main issues that are relevant to today's debate. I have worked almost all my working life in the defence industry, so I hope that I reflect it accurately.

The first issue is smart procurement, which the DPA has promoted and implemented as a way to improve defence procurement. That has involved a change to the procurement cycle, the idea being that the industry is involved at an earlier stage. That may be true, but the overriding desire to get value for money still dominates competitions. MOD staff continually talk about wanting offers from industry that provide 80 per cent. of the capability at 50 per cent. of the cost. Various permutations of percentages are used, depending on who is talking. It is a great principle, but we rarely see it happening, because the DPA evaluation teams are not empowered or organised to assess non-compliant proposals.

Currently, a proposal may arrive from industry that is around 12 inches thick and is broken up into lots of small packages that are distributed to many disparate MOD teams who score it against a set of requirements. At no time do those teams have access to sensitive price data. All they can do is mark each response paragraph as compliant or non-compliant. Each proposal is assessed for its compliance, and in effect only those proposals that are deemed to have cleared the bar are considered for price and other commercial issues. At the end of the day, each company feels compelled to submit a fully compliant and therefore intrinsically expensive bid, and it would take a very brave company indeed to aim under the bar.

The basic point is that the DPA and its customer, the MOD's equipment branch, are not equipped or organised to assess a non-compliant bid that may offer better value for money by proposing a reduced capability and price. If the MOD and the DPA truly want to implement smart procurement they need to change their way of assessing bids and increase the calibre of staff involved in the process.

My second point is about overseas competition, which many hon. Members have mentioned today. The MOD, in its pursuit of competition, encourages overseas companies to compete for work in the UK. All UK defence companies are used to competition—it is a way of life for many of them, and it can be a positive pressure on businesses to ensure that waste is eliminated, overheads are reduced and product development cycles are shortened. It keeps companies fit and lean in the defence industry. However, the marketplaces where we can compete openly in the world are not that big. In fact, we find that we compete with the same companies in the far east and middle east as on our home turf. Okay, all is fair in love and war, but we do not have the opportunity to compete in those competitors' home markets, and the biggest culprit is the USA.

American companies are growing strong on rich pickings at home, and that gives them an added advantage over this country overseas. The UK Government should either get the US and other European domestic markets opened up to fair competition, or they should impose the same domestic restrictions on the US and other countries to protect our defence industrial base. That is the sort of language used in the pubs and clubs in my neck of the woods by people who work in the defence industry.

As I said, I spent most of my working life in the defence industry. I was a worker at Barr and Stroud, which is now called Thales. I also worked in Yarrow shipyard on the Clyde, which is now operated by BAE Systems. I congratulate the people whom I worked beside on the education that I received during that period—I am not blaming them for it—for which I am eternally grateful. Without being too critical, I have to say that the Ministry of Defence is one of the most difficult organisations to deal with. Extreme frustration is caused by procrastination when placing orders. Companies have to wait for orders that keep getting pushed further back down the pipeline. Companies and management sometimes have difficulty retaining their work force while waiting for such orders to come through and holding on to spare parts and components required to fulfil a contract. The Ministry of Defence is not an organisation with which someone would choose to work.

Many jobs in the defence industry have been lost over the years. More jobs have been lost in it than in any other industry of which I am aware. I am proud of the fact that that was done by companies and trade unions getting together to recognise the problems and taking appropriate action. I pay tribute to them, because if they had not acted at the time, we would not have the defence industry that we do, especially on the Clyde.

If we are to have a strong, robust and efficient defence industry, we must give the management and the work force the tools to realise that. That is why we need a long-term strategy that allows employers to plan, where possible, some years ahead in placing contracts and getting the tools to do the job. We must also consider the suppliers to the major contractors, because they have a right to know about the strategy. More importantly, employees in the defence industry must know the direction in which the Government's strategy for defence is going and how that will impact on them.

I am proud of the Government's record on placing MOD contracts with British companies, and I hope that it continues. However, may I also send a message to British companies that depend wholly on defence contracts? The MOD requires only a finite amount of equipment and has only a finite amount of taxpayers' money to spend. Every company involved in the defence industry should develop tangible diversification plans so that when there is a downturn in the defence industry, they will be able to compete in the commercial market.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): As many hon. Members have reminded us, while we sit talking in this comfortable Chamber it is important to bear it in mind that our soldiers, sailors and airmen are putting their lives on the line and themselves in danger on our behalf.

The Minister of State told us how well defence procurement was going. To use his words, he highlighted our successes on defence procurement and said that all issues on smart acquisition had been addressed. Sadly, few people who have spoken in the debate have agreed with him. I do not pretend that defence procurement is easy or that it was easy for Conservative Governments; anyone who does so is foolish. However, we must always remember the end result of failings in defence procurement; a frightened soldier, sailor or airman who is protecting our country's interest and defending us, yet who, because of deficient equipment—a failed radio, a rifle that does not work properly or an engine that does not start—might die. That explains why the debate is important.

The Select Committee Chairman, the right hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) properly highlighted, with great wit, his Committee's report. He also highlighted the Minister's astonishing sensitivities when confronted with criticism. We all know that the truth hurts and that we only get really angry with criticism when it is justified. As many hon. Members said, the report needs a proper reasoned answer, not the Minister's petulant response, and the important points need to be addressed.

If the Minister of State has moved to the right of my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), he should start to be called Genghis by Labour MPs. [HON. MEMBERS: "He already is."] I was not aware of that.

Ms Dari Taylor: Attila.

Mr. Robathan: I thank the hon. Lady for that.

I do not often agree with the Liberal Democrats, but the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) rightly talked of the looming crisis in research and development, echoing my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot. He also spoke of the importance of the ownership of defence companies. Not all defence companies or products have to be British; that would be ridiculous. However, we are right to remember that ownership matters. In the Gulf war in 1991, our Belgian allies had a request from the Ministry of Defence for 5.56 small arms ammunition, which was running short. They refused it.

The hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby) spoke—I hope he does not take this the wrong way—a great deal of sense about defence industrial policy. He said that it is not necessarily benefiting the UK and has a bad effect on our industry while other countries benefit to our detriment. That was an excellent point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) described the indecipherable gobbledegook and management-speak of smart acquisition. He made an excellent critique of the failings of smart acquisition and a sensible point about the need for proper service experience in long-term procurement management.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend) (Lab): On the contribution by the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers), will the hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to dissociate the Conservative party from the disgraceful and gratuitous attack on the work force at Swan Hunter shipbuilders?

Mr. Robathan: The right hon. Gentleman should attend the debate if he wishes to criticise hon. Members who spoke in it.

Mr. Brown rose—

Mr. Robathan: I know that the right hon. Gentleman was here at the beginning, but he was not here when my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport spoke. My hon. Friend's point was reasonable. I have to confess that I have never visited Swan Hunter. I do not know what the situation is there. My hon. Friend has been there, so he spoke with some authority, but I cannot support or deny what he said.

Mr. Brown: It is possible to follow the debate on the closed circuit television that we all have in our offices, which I have been doing. The remarks by the hon. Member for Gosport were gratuitous and offensive. If the Conservative party is to have any standing in such debates, it should take the opportunity to dissociate itself from them.

Mr. Robathan: I am sorry, but I do not intend to associate myself with those remarks. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport took a judgment that Swan Hunter did not have the ability to do the work. Surely anyone is entitled to make such a judgment.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robathan: I am not going to go on about this unimportant point. All this nonsense about an apology is unworthy of the right hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown). He should attend the debate instead of sitting with his feet up in his office drinking tea. If he had attended, he could have intervened on my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport. I was disappointed with my hon. Friend in one respect; he did not mention Haslar, which I think he has mentioned in every other debate.

We also heard from the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith), who described himself as a loyal supporter. The hon. Members for Bassetlaw (John Mann), for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) and for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) all made points that were not supportive of the Government. It was not that they were anti-Government, but their criticisms were good. Even in her loyal speech, the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) reported that she had identified problems and demanded that the UK support UK defence manufacturing industry; a fair point.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) made an excellent speech and asked some pertinent questions about the aerospace industry and where skills would come from. Those questions need answers from the Minister. The dialogue that he mentioned earlier is not enough.

I joined the armed forces in 1970, which makes me distressingly old. I shall tell a short story that illustrates defence procurement. With a very short haircut I was shown around the Royal Marines commando training centre—perhaps "shown around" is not the right way to describe it—and I remember a signals captain showing me something called an A40. Some hon. Members may have carried an A40. It was a big one, and very heavy. I carried it across Dartmoor, the Brecon Beacons and all sorts of places. It was almost impossible to tune and very inefficient. The person who had the job of carrying it was the unlucky one. In 1970 the marine captain said, "Don't worry, Clansman is coming in soon. It's a brilliant new set and we're all going to have Clansman." This is not a party political point, I hasten to tell the Minister. I rejoined my battalion in 1987 in Hong Kong and we still had Larkspur A40s. It was only in 1988, 18 years after I had been told that it was coming soon, that Clansman came in.

I mention that because Bowman's original in-service date was 1995; under a Conservative Government, I know. The Labour Government said in 1999 that the in-service date was 2002 and it eventually came into service in March this year. Procurement is dogged by such delays. It needs to be sorted out, but I do not have any pat answers.

Smart acquisition, of which we have heard a great deal, was introduced six years ago, but we have yet to see evidence that it is working. It was intended to result in faster, cheaper, better procurement, delivering "best value for money for the taxpayer", but the Government cannot continue to claim that the strategy is working if, as we heard earlier, the 20 biggest projects are already delayed by, on average, a year and a half and the taxpayer is footing the bill for the Government's £3 billion overspend. Typhoon was four and a half years behind its target in-service date and will cost at least £1 billion more than promised.

Let me emphasise the consequences of delays and overspend. Not only are service personnel jeopardised when they find themselves on the front line without the equipment that they need, but there is the prospect of having to cancel or scale down the size of projects, as in the case of Type 45 destroyers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot mentioned the Defence Procurement Agency's "woeful" track record, which the Chairman of the Select Committee also described. The cancellation of the human centrifuge project, which has not been mentioned, is an example of how the MOD has lost its grip on the procurement process. In 1997 a contract worth £14 million to design and build a human centrifuge to allow trainee pilots to experience G-force was let to the US firm Environmental Tectonics Corporation, ETC. In July 2001 the MOD took the decision to cancel the project, citing "the failure of that company to deliver a centrifuge to the Royal Air Force".

Before the project's cancellation, the MOD had already made progress payments of almost £6 million, which were of course written off.

The costs to the taxpayer of the centrifuge that never was do not end there. Earlier this year the MOD had to pay cancellation costs. According to the 2003–04 annual report and accounts of the MOD, under the rather euphemistic heading "Constructive Losses", the final cost of the project to the British taxpayer was reported to be £14.4 million. The MOD paid more to cancel the project than it would have cost to acquire the centrifuge. The project was not cancelled on grounds of insurmountable risk or because of an inability to achieve the desired capability, as ETC was able to design and build the centrifuge. It was cancelled as a result of the Government's inability to manage the procurement process. I can report to the House that the centrifuge, designed and built with British taxpayers' money, is in full operational service with a far eastern air force. That is what we call smart acquisition; by them.

[Mr. Robathan]

We hear much about future effects and capability, but what happens first is cuts. The promised future capability is often still at drawing-board level, while our forces have to cope with what they have been left with. Is that sensible at a time when our forces are experiencing overstretch as never before?

Admiral Sir Alan West has acknowledged that the reductions in the fleet leave the Royal Navy exposed to "enhanced risk". He has said:

> "People should be under no illusions that with only 25 destroyers and frigates we will be very close to the cusp . . . my concern overall is that we are taking risk on risk".

I come now to logistics in the Gulf war last year. British troops were dubbed "the borrowers" by their American counterparts because they were short of equipment. That is not new, because troops always like having other people's equipment, but nevertheless it is true. The hon. Member for South-East Cornwall mentioned equipment survey findings in Iraq. The 2003 survey for the Army last year found that 55 per cent. of troops and 42 per cent. of officers had bought items of kit with their own money.

Mr. Caplin: There is nothing unusual in that.

Mr. Robathan: Indeed, there is nothing unusual in that, but it is rather worrying that they feel compelled so to do.

In addition, 1 Armoured Division had to come back to find the kit that they needed in the UK. That should not have happened. The 1991 Gulf war had an enormous logistical build-up. As people said, there was no warning; it began from a standing start and took a long time, but the logistics were fantastic. Very good kit was delivered when we needed it.

Just-in-time equipment is fine, but we are not talking about cans of beans. We are talking about issues that may affect soldiers' lives, and—as the Commandant General of the Royal Marines said earlier this week and as my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot mentioned—more equipment should be stockpiled.

I very much hope that we will see two carriers, but the in-service date for the first CVF is 2012, and 2005 is less than two months away. When will the contracts be signed? When will the keels be laid? What will be the long-term running costs? I heard an extraordinary suggestion, which I am sure should be dismissed, of £3 billion per year per ship. What will be the complement of each carrier and, given that the Minister is cutting manpower now, is he confident that trained crew will be available to man them? Will he say something about point defence and close-in weapons systems? Like our existing carriers, the US carriers have a close-in weapons system, but unlike ours they also have Sea Sparrow surface-to-air missiles. We will have to rely on the Carrier Air Group, but the Type 45 air defence ships will be reduced from the projected 12 to eight. That does not leave many spare for two carrier forces.

Other hon. Members have spoken about shipbuilding, and I do not want to dwell on that, except to say that we need to overcome the cycle of feast and famine that characterises the shipbuilding industry. The Select Committee's report in July 2004 referred to the Astute programme and particularly mentioned that delays were exacerbated by shortfalls in skills. The MOD needs to concentrate on creating a stable procurement programme; a smoother pattern of demand in order to retain workers and protect the UK's valuable shipbuilding expertise, which I believe is referred to as gap filling.

I return now to the issue of through-life management, which was particularly mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport. Civil servants are sent for two, three or four years to deal with a project, and service personnel are posted for two, three or four years to deal with a procurement project. They realise that they will not see it into service, so they try to put off making decisions. They do not want to see it in service because they will end up with the problems. My hon. Friend was right. We need a new approach. We need people to see a project through from beginning to end. We need people with experience and an understanding of service life, and we need long-term continuity in project management. Conservatives intend that that should happen.

All hon. Members want our troops well equipped, which is why we have been debating the matter. I hope that the Minister will now respond in a reasoned manner to the criticism that he has heard from the Defence Committee and everybody else because our servicemen deserve nothing less.

5.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I begin by welcoming the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) to his new shadow Defence responsibilities and look forward to further exchanges in the months and years to come.

Twelve Back Benchers contributed to this afternoon's interesting debate: my right hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George); my hon. Friends the Members for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby), for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith), for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor), for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths), for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson), for Bassetlaw (John Mann) and for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan); the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), who is a regular contributor; and the hon. Members for Gosport (Mr. Viggers), for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) and for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett). I shall try to respond to as many points as possible in the time available, but, given other matters, that may be not possible, in which case I shall ensure that hon. Members receive written responses to their inquiries.

As the hon. Member for Blaby said, equipping our service personnel with battle-winning capabilities is a matter close to this House's heart. We owe a considerable debt to our people, and I pay tribute to those men and women in the armed forces who are currently engaged in serious and dangerous undertakings throughout the world. The Government are committed to ensuring that our armed forces remain highly capable and effective. Through our procurement plans and by making sure that our armed forces are properly equipped, they can respond effectively to the challenges that they confront, day in, day out.

In his opening remarks this afternoon, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State outlined the continued improvements to the way in which we procure equipment. Procurement is a vital part of the MOD's role and has often been subject to criticism. In his final words this afternoon, my right hon. Friend said, "Do we have a perfect track record on procurement? No, but no Government ever have." That point should form the basis for this debate.

We have taken many of the valid criticisms on board, but there is much to be proud about. The urgent operational requirement process rapidly equips and supports our armed forces at the front line in Iraq, and has been a success. The process proved to be flexible and adaptable, and I reject any suggestion that our forces have been let down by the MOD and the Government. Indeed, the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) raised urgent operational requirements in an intervention. Urgent operational requirements are an accepted means of supporting operations and are an effective and efficient way to target activity against emerging operational priorities. The National Audit Office has complimented the urgent operational requirement process.

I shall respond to the comments made by the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) about yesterday's court martial. I am sure that the House will join me in extending our deepest sympathies to the family of Sergeant Nightingale, who was killed in that tragic incident. We are aware of the finding of the court martial arising from the death of Sergeant Nightingale. Lance Corporal Braymire was found guilty of a military offence concerning his failure to conduct normal safety procedures, which do not involve advanced technical procedures. He had successfully completed his weapons handling test, which included passing the safety modules, during his mobilisation training.

Mr. Soames: On Lance Corporal Braymire, will the Minister accept that 2,300 young men went to the Gulf as reservists without properly certified weapons training? Will he assure the House that the board of inquiry, which we understand has been set up, will report, that its findings will be made public and that the people responsible for that gross failing will be held to account, whatever rank, military or civilian, they may be?

Mr. Caplin: The hon. Gentleman is right. In accordance with our normal procedures, an Army board of inquiry has been set up. It was rightly stayed, pending the outcome of the court martial. We have seen the findings of the court martial only in the past 24 hours and will of course consider very seriously the comments of the judge advocate. However, we are yet to receive a full copy of the transcript, and I think that the hon. Gentleman would accept that we should wait to see that before going any further.

We heard about the ITAR waiver and the importance that the House attaches to it. There has been progress on that front. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister last raised the issue with President Bush in June in the margins of the NATO summit meeting. We will continue to press the point, and contributions from both sides of the House are welcome.

Much has been said about the Defence Committee's report on procurement, about which I intervened on my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan. I was rather taken with the Committee Chairman's suggestion that we should have preliminary discussions before the Government responses are published. That is okay provided that he is prepared to offer us the same facility before his Committee publishes a report. Perhaps the MOD and the Committee can discuss that in the weeks to come.

I want to highlight one or two aspects of the Committee's report. It claimed that the performance of the Defence Procurement Agency could only be described as woeful; my right hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South tried to suggest that the word was meant to be "wonderful", which might have given a different tone to the whole report. We cannot accept that the agency's performance was woeful in that particular year, when it delivered £3.6 billion of new equipment.

The report said that there are still problems in relation to four legacy projects. We accept that, although I should say that the Committee particularly welcomed the progress that we have made on Nimrod and Astute to try to deal with the situation. Around 40 per cent. of the cost increases comprise internal interest on capital charges.

The other significant aspect of the report relates to paragraph 53, which refers to a "fear culture" at the Defence Procurement Agency. Several hon. Members tried to explain what they think that means, but it clearly relates directly to staff. The Ministry of Defence wholeheartedly rejects the assertion that such a culture exists. The Committee did not substantiate it, and although it had many opportunities to consult MOD officials and my noble Friend Lord Bach, it failed to do so. The House will understand that such an accusation could have a serious effect on morale at the agency. I am afraid that the Committee did not properly think that through.

I hope that we can move on from here, but it is right and proper to place on record our feelings about the report and its failings, notwithstanding the fact that that there are of course lessons to be learned from the Committee's comments.

I want to move on to comments made by Members. Various Opposition Members suggested that CVF—the future aircraft carrier—is now being run by a committee. In fact, it is an alliance. That works well in other industries and there is no reason why it should not work well in defence procurement. As the House knows, BAE Systems is an important member of that alliance.

I was very disappointed by what the hon. Member for Gosport said about Swan Hunter. I utterly reject his comments and strongly support those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown) and my hon. Friends the Members for Stockton, South and for Glasgow, Pollok. Conservative Front-Bench Members could, in winding up the debate, have dissociated themselves from the hon. Gentleman's comments; they should have done.

[Mr. Caplin]

I will just say this: those who work at Swan Hunter and the people of the north-east will have heard what the hon. Gentleman said today.

The hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) asked me about Devonport, and I undertake to write to him about those issues. The hon. Member for Aldershot asked about Galileo. It is a civil system under civil control, as has been confirmed by successive EU Transport Councils. The requirement for navigation and timing information to support UK armed forces will continue to be met by GPS, which remains the de facto NATO standard.

I return to the hon. Member for Gosport—on a slightly happier note, I hope—to answer his point about shipbuilding. There are three Astutes, two Type 45 destroyers and two handling ship docks that he might regard as being in some phase of construction.

There was a suggestion that the Defence Procurement Agency accounts may affect our ability to complete some of our planned projects. The figures presented show the value of actual contracts placed with suppliers, less any expenditure recorded elsewhere in the accounts. They do not in any way mean that funding to meet commitments for our procurement programme is not available. I hope that I have clarified that point.

In the short time remaining, I want to make a couple of final points about industrial policy and future capabilities. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State set out in his opening remarks the key principles of the defence industrial policy and the importance of defence manufacturing industrial support. That was welcomed by many Labour Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South. I take this opportunity to emphasise a further aspect of that important policy. Our partnership with industry is crucial in equipping and sustaining our front-line forces. In achieving those objectives, it is vital that the Ministry of Defence and industry continue to work together. We must seek fully to understand the pressures on industry but, in return, industry must respond effectively to the challenge of delivering equipment to time and to cost in fulfilling the contracts that it wins from the MOD.

On future capabilities, I want to emphasise that the challenges faced by our armed forces are complex and ever changing, as I hope the House understands. We have to make difficult procurement decisions today and tomorrow to equip our forces for that unpredictable future. We are often looking decades in advance, so it is not a simple business. Just as our armed forces will have to be increasingly flexible and adaptable in future, so will our procurement plans. The proposals outlined in the future capabilities announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in July will be implemented over the coming years. We plan to increase our capacity to undertake expeditionary operations alongside an equipment programme that is delivering, and will continue to deliver, an advanced range of capabilities.

This Government are investing in defence. For the third successive spending review, we have been able to announce real growth in the defence budget. That is without precedent. We owe a considerable debt of gratitude and thanks to our people, wherever they are serving, at home and abroad. Their courage, determination and ability are making the difference across the world, but that in itself would not be enough without sustained investment in defence and the continued modernisation of our armed forces which will help to guarantee our battle-winning capability long into the future.

It is only right that our armed forces, the best in the world, are provided with the equipment and support that they need to do the job. Procurement plays its part in that process; it has delivered, and will continue to deliver, in that important task. Our investment in network-enabled capability will deliver increasingly agile and precise military capability. Our future procurement programme will support more flexible and deployable forces with world-beating kit tailored to achieve that effect. I can assure the House that this Government will spare no effort in making that happen.

Jim Fitzpatrick (Poplar and Canning Town) (Lab): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Thursday 11th November, paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on Amendments) shall apply to the Motion in the name of Mr Michael Howard as if the day were an Opposition Day; proceedings on the Motion may continue, though opposed, for three hours and shall then lapse if not previously disposed of; and the Orders of the House of 28th June 2001 and 6th November 2003 relating to deferred Divisions shall not apply.—[Jim Fitzpatrick.]

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Yesterday, the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) made a point of order. He was rightly concerned about an invitation that was sent yesterday to hon. Members and journalists to a meeting that was planned to take place in the House next Tuesday. I regret that the meeting was booked in my name and I wanted to take the first opportunity to assure hon. Members that, contrary to normal requirements, I was not shown the invitation for clearance prior to dispatch. I would not have authorised it if I had done so. As soon as I became aware of the incident, I cancelled the room booking and told the group in question that the meeting was firmly off. I asked the group to notify those who were invited. I greatly regret any inconvenience to Officers of the House or concern to Members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The House will be grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that clear on the record, so that the least inconvenience is caused to anyone.

Incident in Iraq

6 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): We have received reports of a serious incident in Iraq. I know that hon. Members will appreciate that it is often difficult immediately to establish a clear picture of events and precise details of what has happened. However, I greatly regret that I can confirm to the House that, in an attack on British forces in the Black Watch area of operations, we have suffered a number of casualties, including three fatalities. The process of informing their next of kin is under way, and I hope that hon. Members will accept that that should take place before we release fuller details. However, I can say that United States forces helped to provide urgent medical support at the scene of the incident, for which I know that our forces were grateful.

I know that I speak for the whole House when I say that our thoughts are with those soldiers and their loved ones.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): I thank the Minister for coming to the House with the grave news. Her Majesty's loyal Opposition extend their deepest condolences to the families of the three soldiers of the Black Watch who have this day given their lives in action, and to the families of those who have been involved in the incident.

The country will want to wish the Black Watch well as they continue to carry out their duties.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): This is indeed tragic news. On behalf of the Liberal Democrats, I send our condolences to the families of those killed and injured, to the members of the Black Watch and all the members of Her Majesty's armed forces serving in Iraq.Whatever our views on the war, our armed forces are performing a difficult job under difficult circumstances. Our thoughts are with them tonight.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): On behalf of the Scottish National party, I should like to express shock and sadness at the death and injury of Black Watch soldiers in Iraq. Everyone's thoughts go to their families and friends. I am certain that the Minister appreciates that the tragic news will have profound implications for public opinion in Scotland.

Diego Garcians (Surrey)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Margaret Moran.]

6.3 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): I echo the expressions of concern that hon. Members throughout the Chamber have uttered about the incident in Iraq.

I am grateful for the opportunity to raise an issue that causes considerable and immediate concern in my constituency, but clearly has far wider implications and has its origins in a distant place and at a distant time. As well as my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt), my hon. Friends the Members for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford), for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), for Woking (Mr. Malins) and for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) have taken a keen interest in the matter—it is good to see my hon. Friends in their places—and wish to be associated with my remarks.

I must admit that until I received a telephone call on the evening of 19 October, I was only sketchily aware of the long and wretched story of the Chagos islands and their people. It is a shabby story of international power politics and betrayal. It is a stain on the integrity of British foreign policy. I know that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is not responsible for foreign policy, but I will argue that it now has a key responsibility for the consequences of what happened.

I do not wish to replicate the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) in Westminster Hall yesterday. The focus of this debate is on the practical problems that we face now and in the future. It is clear, however, that past Government actions led directly to the call that I received on 19 October, and to the problem that we are discussing today. It is therefore worth rehearsing those briefly.

In 1966, Harold Wilson's Government acquiesced to an American request to purchase and depopulate the British Indian Ocean Territory in order to build an airbase on the principal island of Diego Garcia. It has been suggested that, in return, Britain got a special offer on Polaris submarines. Be that as it may, the plantations were closed, and with them the island's economy. The supply ships were diverted and the majority of the islanders were exiled to a slum area of Port Louis, the capital of Mauritius. Some went to the Seychelles. Eventually, in November 2000, following an action brought by the chairman of the Chagos refugees group, the High Court ruled that the islanders had the legal right to return. Attempts to return, however, were obstructed and proved unsuccessful.

Under the British Overseas Territories Act 2002, a majority of the exiles became British citizens, allowing them to enter and reside in the United Kingdom. In 2003, about 100 destitute islanders arrived at Gatwick airport and settled in Crawley, West Sussex. It is good to see the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) in her place, as I know that she has wrestled with this issue for some considerable time. It is reported that the support that they have so far received from West Sussex county council has cost local taxpayers £500,000.

I have said that this is a shabby story. The latest and, perhaps, shabbiest twist of all came in June this year. On the day of the local government and European elections, when eyes were elsewhere, without notification to the House, let alone debate, the Government signed two Orders in Council, the effect of which was to overturn the High Court judgment and reimpose the legal ban on the islanders' ability to return to Diego Garcia.

[Mr. Peter Ainsworth]

This is the position: the Government have finally cut off the remaining hope of returning to the islands, and legislated to enable the islanders to come to Britain. Given that the only other choice available is to remain in Port Louis, where they claim to live in conditions of poverty, drug abuse, unemployment and prostitution, it is hardly surprising that many would prefer to make a new life in Britain. Certainly, I have no argument with their decision to do so.

Now we come to the telephone call of 19 October. It was from Councillor Mrs. Spiers, leader of Reigate and Banstead borough council. She told me that 45 islanders had arrived at Gatwick and, following a court decision that discharged West Sussex county council from an obligation to house all but the most vulnerable of them, 33 had effectively thrown themselves on the mercy of her council. They were being housed in temporary accommodation in Horley in my constituency, at a cost of some £20 per person per night. Her question was straightforward: she understood the plight of the islanders, but why should the council tax payers of Reigate and Banstead be solely responsible for footing the bill for their maintenance? That is a question that I hope the hon. Member for Gillingham (Paul Clark) will answer directly.

My expectations of a helpful response are not high. When my conversation with Councillor Mrs. Spiers had ended, and having established via the Home Office that this was not an immigration issue—on the ground that the individuals concerned were British—but a matter for the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, I sent an urgent fax to the Minister for Local and Regional Government, setting out the issue and concluding:

> "I would be most grateful if you might let me know what provisions exist for your Department to provide financial support to the Council to cover these exceptional circumstances: and it would also be greatly appreciated if you could arrange for an appropriate official to contact the Council as a matter of urgency in order to discuss the situation".

I then provided the direct contact details of the leader and chief executive of the council.

That was on 19 October. It is now 4 November, and nobody from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has bothered to make any contact with the council. It would be helpful if the hon. Gentleman could explain why there has been no communication at all, despite that urgent request.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reigate and I visited the islanders last Friday. They have been moved into a block of sheltered flats, somewhat to the alarm of a number of elderly residents, and although their accommodation is cramped, they are being well cared for. The council deserves to be congratulated on the way that it has handled the issue. It immediately reacted with humanitarian assistance, while at the same time seeking to protect local residents from a potentially open-ended financial liability. It thus sought to discharge its moral duty to the islanders and fiduciary duty to local people.

As the Minister will know, solicitors acting for the Chagossians successfully sought a judicial review of the council's decision to refuse temporary accommodation in respect of one of the applicants, on the ground that he was not habitually resident. Pending the outcome of the judicial review, the council decided to accommodate all the islanders, in order, as it said, to save the public purse from any further judicial review requests. The court determined on 1 November that the council should continue to house them until the outcome of the review of the original decision. Meanwhile, the council is assessing the islanders' entitlements under separate homelessness legislation. I am sorry if this all sounds a bit complicated, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I am afraid that it is.

The House might take the view that it was strange for the court to come to a decision that the islanders could arguably be considered to be habitual residents of the United Kingdom when they had only been here for a couple of weeks. But this decision only serves to underline the need for the Government to intervene to resolve the matter. Having looked at the full circumstances of the case and its history, Mr. Justice Moses acknowledged—and this is significant—that the real issue was the Government's need to address the problems of the islanders. He said that there were very unusual circumstances in the case, and that, in his view, a substantive case could be made that the habitual residence occurred as soon as the Chagossians arrived in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Justice Moses stated that he had great sympathy with the local authority, saying that it was certainly arguable that this was a matter not for the authority but for central Government. However, he was quite clear that, in a humane and civilised society, it was unacceptable not to provide any temporary accommodation for the islanders, as that would merely mean that they would return to Gatwick, where there were no facilities whatever. He is quoted in today's edition of the Surrey Mirror under the rather unhelpful but none the less true headline, "You foot bill for homeless Diego Garcians", saying:

> "The prospect of their wandering around and gravitating back to Gatwick is not something that any civilised human being can contemplate."

Given the unique circumstances of the case, this judgment seems understandable. However, it does nothing to resolve the difficulties faced by the council, or the basic injustice of requiring my constituents, and those of my hon. Friends the Members for Reigate and for Epsom and Ewell, to foot the entire bill for housing the islanders for an undetermined period of time.

And it does not end there. While the immediate issue surrounds the 33 islanders in Horley, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that, in response to my written question, the Foreign Office stated on 1 November that > "it is estimated that there are about 5,000 Chagossians who enjoy British citizenship with the right of abode in the UK following the coming into force of the British Overseas Territories Act in May 2002. Since then, the British High Commissions in Mauritius and Seychelles have issued more than 900 British passports to Chagossians".—[Official Report, 1 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 73W.]

My hon. Friend the Member for Reigate asked in the debate yesterday why more than 900 passports had been applied for when these people had perfectly good Mauritian travel documents of their own. It would be responsible to conclude that at least 900 people are actively considering following their compatriots to Gatwick; a further 4,100 are in a position to do so. It would be logical to expect them to want to settle close to other former islanders in the Horley and Gatwick areas. It would therefore be sensible for the Government to make plans now for this event.

I am aware that solicitors acting for the islanders are seeking an exemption from the relevant regulations so that, on arrival, they may be deemed eligible for housing and other benefits. If they are successful in this, it would certainly help the council's legal bills, but it would compound the problems that it faces in meeting the needs of the islanders from its very limited means. I am sure that I do not have to warn the hon. Gentleman of the consequences were thousands of islanders to arrive and were the cost of their maintenance to remain a local responsibility.

I am proud to say that local people have to date shown sympathy and good will towards the islanders, although I have already been asked by one homeless man why he is sleeping rough in a playing field when the islanders are not. I remind the hon. Gentleman that there are at present about 2,000 people already on the waiting list for housing in the Reigate and Banstead area. Good will can be stretched only so far. It is therefore essential that, in replying to this debate, he understands the potentially very serious nature of the issue.

As I said in yesterday's debate, the long-term solution lies with the Foreign Office, and I was pleased to hear that the Foreign Office Minister has indicated that he would consider raising the question of aid measures with the Department for International Development. However, the short-term solution lies with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. We are seeking a solution that is fair both to the islanders and to local residents. The problem has arisen as a result of action by central Government, and it is time for central Government to shoulder their responsibilities.

The Minister may recall that a few years ago, when Surrey unexpectedly played host to General Pinochet, the county police were awarded a special one-off payment from the Home Office to help offset the exceptional security costs associated with their new temporary resident, on the ground that he was in Surrey for reasons to do with Government decisions entirely beyond Surrey's control. There is an obvious parallel in the present case.

Let me end with another quotation from the Surrey Mirror's report of the recent court hearing:

> "Told that, until the legal issues were resolved, there was nothing that Central Government could do, the judge suggested: 'Well, write a cheque'".

I look forward to the Minister's response to that simple request.

6.15 pm

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) for allowing me to make a brief contribution, and for his kind words about my debate with the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell) yesterday.

Yesterday's reply was extremely disappointing. It did not suggest that the Government were treating the issue with the seriousness and immediacy that it requires. It is a consequence of the Government's Orders in Council, presented in June, that we now face what is potentially an increasingly difficult challenge for local authorities. It is very important for the services required for these people to be established in Mauritius and the Seychelles before they come to the United Kingdom—but if the Government are not going to do that, they really must offer assistance to the local authorities that have to host the people.

There is a clear need for joined-up government. If the hon. Member for Gillingham has nothing to offer local authorities this evening, as the Under-Secretary had nothing to offer the people of Diego Garcia and the rest of the Chagos islands yesterday, I must tell him that this will certainly not be the last he has heard of the matter.

6.16 pm

Paul Clark (Gillingham) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) on securing the debate.

The Government are well aware of the importance of the issues facing local authorities as a result of the arrival of a number of Chagossians in Britain. I hope that following my response the hon. Gentleman, and the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt), will appreciate the importance that we attach to this, and will also take account of the resources that have been and are available and of other issues arising from the case.

Because there was clearly a very good debate in Westminster Hall yesterday, and because my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs responded to it, I do not want to go into details of the history at great length; but following what the hon. Member for East Surrey has said, I want to put one or two things on record.

The Chagos islands were part of the dependency of Mauritius, and continue to be administered under that scheme. On achieving independence in 1968, with the agreement of the Mauritius Council of Ministers they were detached to form part of the British Indian Ocean Territory, which was rightly created to meet the defence needs of the United States and Britain. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will know that the plantations to which he referred were ceasing to be economically viable at the time. For that reason as well as for defence reasons, it was decided that the islanders should be removed. That happened in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

The vast majority of the islanders, some 1,200, were relocated to Mauritius, although some went to the Seychelles. They automatically acquired either Mauritian or Seychelles citizenship when those countries achieved independence, and they retained their status as citizens of the United Kingdom and the colonies. Entirely correctly, under the British Overseas Territories Act 2002 they were given the additional status of full British citizenship. That carries the right of abode in the United Kingdom, and as we know and the hon. Gentleman mentioned, some have taken up that opportunity. Of course, that also gives them freedom of access to other European countries, but the suggestion that the Orders in Council may have been used in an underhand way is incorrect. The hon. Gentleman will be well aware that it is common practice to deal with such decisions through the use of Orders in Council when amending the constitution of an overseas territory, so nothing different was done in that regard. In addition, some of the islanders were in fact seeking British citizenship before the Orders in Council were put in place. They continue to apply for such citizenship, as we know.

Any Chagossian applying for a British passport at our high commission in Mauritius receives clear guidance on what to expect if they travel to the UK. This guidance—in the form of a leaflet in English and Creole that is placed in each passport—stresses that it is their responsibility to ensure before travelling that they have the necessary resources, or that they can rely on friends or family who are already here.

In addition, our high commissioner in Mauritius wrote to the leading member of the Chagossian community on 27 September. It is worth quoting that letter, which states:

> "Those Chagossians who are British citizens are of course free to go the United Kingdom if they wish. However, as you know, those that do exercise this right cannot expect more favourable treatment than any other British citizen going to the United Kingdom from abroad and, just like any other British citizen, they have to fulfil the normal conditions of entitlement and habitual residence before qualifying for social security benefits etc. These entitlements are clearly set out in the leaflet which accompanies each new passport issued to members of your community by the British High Commission passport section."

Mr. Ainsworth: I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman explained whether that letter is legally binding in any way, and if so, whether anyone had told Mr. Justice Moses.

Paul Clark: We have a duty and a responsibility to ensure that we communicate clearly to such people their position and rights, to the extent that they prevail. We are making it clear through the issuing of that letter that those who seek to come here as British citizens have no automatic right to accommodation or benefits. As I understand it, that letter was given wide coverage in the Mauritian press. Such information is also given to every new applicant for a British passport, including the 900 people who recently applied, to whom the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Ainsworth: The point is that such people are currently receiving accommodation at the expense of the public purse, so something seems to have gone wrong with the hon. Gentleman's logic.

Paul Clark: Nothing has gone wrong with the logic. What we have to understand is the legal responsibilities and the legalities of the process of becoming a British citizen, and the rights to which that entitles individuals. I will deal in due course with homelessness, local authorities and the resources available.

I turn to the Reigate and Banstead case. I listened very carefully to what was said about the number of such people who could come to this country. That is an issue, but we have to deal with the facts. It was suggested that thousands could come, but the fact that 900 people have applied for passports does not mean that all will come here to seek accommodation and resources; it is not necessary to follow that logic. Small groups of Chagossians have made their way to the UK. The most recent group, of some 43, arrived at Gatwick airport at the beginning of October. I have said very clearly that they are welcome to be here in the UK, but we have also made it clear that they are expected to support and accommodate themselves when they arrive. Income-related benefits and local authority housing are generally not available to persons from abroad, including British citizens, who are not habitually resident in the UK.

In the case of the most recent arrivals, I understand that they were all accommodated by West Sussex county council for a temporary period while care assessments were made under the National Assistance Act 1948. I believe that the county council is continuing to accommodate a small number of them. Most of the Chagossians were subsequently required to leave the hotel accommodation provided by West Sussex council, and it seems that the next port of call for them was the housing authority. Accommodation was provided by West Sussex in Horley, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency in the district of Reigate and Banstead borough council. About 31 applications have now been made under the homelessness legislation.

We must recognise that homelessness legislation is there to protect all people who are genuinely homeless or claim to be genuinely homeless. That is why I laid out clearly what our High Commission says to British citizens about what they can expect. When they are here, they then fall under the provisions of the homelessness legislation, which provides an important safety net for vulnerable people who find themselves facing a housing crisis.

Where specified criteria are met—that is, that applicants are eligible for assistance, have become homeless through no fault of their own and fall within a priority need group—the local housing authority must ensure that suitable accommodation is available until a settled home can be found. Lesser duties apply in cases where homelessness is intentional or where the applicant does not have a priority need for accommodation. Those categories are defined in the legislation.

I understand that the decision by Reigate and Banstead, in all the cases concerning the Chagossian arrivals, was that the applicants were ineligible for housing assistance because they were persons from abroad who were not habitually resident in the UK, or the wider area including the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man. I am sure that all hon. Members would agree that it is important for proper decisions to be made concerning homeless applications, and would understand why safeguards are built into the legislation.

Applicants have the right to ask the local authority internally to review a decision that they are ineligible for assistance, and I understand that the Chagos islanders have exercised that right with the Reigate and Banstead borough council. As a further safeguard, the legislation also gives local housing authorities a discretionary power to accommodate applicants while they carry out a review. Reigate and Banstead council originally decided not to exercise its power to provide applicants with accommodation, pending an internal review. There has also been a review of the High Court proceedings, to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Ainsworth: We are running short of time, so I would be grateful if, before the hon. Gentleman concludes, he could say very simply whether he believes that it is fair that our constituents should foot the bill, solely and by themselves, for these people who are here as a direct consequence of the Government's actions. Does he not think that it would be a fairer system if the Government shouldered their own responsibility in this case?

Paul Clark: Of course, the hon. Gentleman will be well aware of the substantial moneys that local government receives for a whole host of activities that councils have to carry out and have to meet in the numerous operations in which they are involved. That was very much the point that I was making. Members cannot ignore the substantial increases in moneys that have gone to local authorities. There has been a 30 per cent. real-terms increase over the last seven years. That is a fact and there is no question about it. Additionally, substantially more moneys have been announced in the spending review earlier this year as going into local government finance generally. Authorities in Surrey have benefited from the extra money that we have made available. Surrey county council received a grant increase 7.7 per cent. increase in this year's settlement, well above the average for county councils. District councils also received good grant increases, with Reigate and Banstead receiving a grant increase of 3.6 per cent.

Mr. Blunt: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Paul Clark: I will give way if there is time, but I want to answer the hon. Member for East Surrey properly. The House will be aware that the homelessness provision given by the Government to local authorities is made by means of the formula block known as the environmental, protective and cultural services. Local authorities have substantial flexibility when it comes to its use.

We have also given local authorities substantial direct resources through the rate support grant, but the issue at the heart of this debate is of a piece with the difficulty in respect of homelessness and housing that all authorities face, but especially those in London and the south-east. The pressures are substantial.

The Government are putting substantial moneys into meeting the requirements of making affordable housing available and making provision for homeless families. That is true in Reigate and Banstead, and everywhere else in the country. We are well aware of the pressures that local authorities face, but we have made substantial additional resources available.

I know that the events under discussion were unexpected, but we expect local authorities to plan for any such contingency that might arise. Substantial increases in resources have been made available to Reigate and Banstead, and substantial reserves are available to enable local authorities meet any contingency.

Legislation is in place to protect people who are genuinely homeless, and the necessary procedures are in hand. We expect local authorities to be able to deal with any contingencies that arise. We recognise the important pressures faced by local authorities, and the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs said yesterday—

The motion having been made after Six o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at twenty-seven minutes to Seven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

WORK AND PENSIONS

The Secretary of State was asked—

New Deal

1. Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): How many disabled people the new deal for disabled people has helped back to work. [196316]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): Since the national launch of the programme in 2001, more than 45,000 people have gained a job through new deal for disabled people.

Laura Moffatt: I am sure that everyone is delighted to hear that news, but it is important to say that when disabled people need access to the workplace they require extra help and support. This fantastic programme has provided that. Will my right hon. Friend tell the House exactly what extra training goes on with advisers to assist people with disabilities into the workplace?

Alan Johnson: The important contribution is made by the disability employment advisers: their expertise, as well as the involvement of the employer through various groups, has given us those extraordinary access figures. It might be as well to point out that the 45,000 figure is the number of disabled people who have obtained work through the new deal for disabled people. As a result of all the new deal programmes taken together, however, 180,000 disabled people have found work, so we are talking about the expertise not only of the disability employment advisers in the new deal for disabled people, but of those who work in other programmes under the new deal.

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): What reassurance can the Secretary of State offer to those organisations such as the Shaw Trust and the Groundwork Trust, which are being told this year that they must cut back on the number of disabled people whom they are successfully placing in work?

Alan Johnson: The reassurance we would give them is the reassurance that we have already given them; the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), has made that clear on several occasions. We are looking very carefully at the needs of providers. This is a problem of success in the sense that the Shaw Trust, which does a marvellous job, as do the other providers, has been more successful than we thought in getting disabled people into work. We are constantly evaluating the programme, and we are having regular discussions. We think that as this is, uniquely, an outcome-funded arrangement, we can find a solution to the problem that the Shaw Trust has identified.

Pensioner Poverty

2. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): What steps he is taking to tackle pensioner poverty. [196317]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): We have taken many steps to tackle pensioner poverty, including the introduction of pension credit and winter fuel payments. As a result of those and other measures, during 2004–05 we will be spending nearly £10 billion more on pensioners, including £5 billion more on the poorest third. That means that the poorest pensioners are, on average, £1,820 per annum, or £35 a week, better off in real terms than they would have been under the 1997 system.

I am today publishing in the Library the pension credit take-up figures to September 2004. They show that pension credit is playing a vital role in helping to give more money to the people who need it most: 2.62 million pensioner households are benefiting, with 3.18 million individuals receiving an average award of about £41 a week.

Mr. Carmichael: I thank the Secretary of State for that very full answer. He will be aware that his Department's own figures showed that in 2002–03 some 2.2 million pensioners were still living below the poverty line. Given his welcome recent statements in which he accepts there were problems with pension credit take-up and that it provides a disincentive to save and his acknowledgement that he is veering towards the idea of a citizen's pension based on residency, how much longer will he be veering and when might we eventually see flesh put on those interesting and laudable ideas?

Alan Johnson: I can veer exhaustively; I shall be veering for a while longer. On the particular point about pension credit, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency 1,858 households and 2,153 individuals are benefiting. While the issue of take-up should be at the forefront of our minds, we are two thirds of the way towards our target in a third of the time available. Pension credit has just passed its first anniversary, and in Orkney and Shetland and elsewhere it is making a remarkable contribution.

Mr. Stephen Hepburn (Jarrow) (Lab): Why are we, on the one hand, quite laudably giving out those benefits to pensioners to reduce pensioner poverty yet, on the other, making it harder and harder for them to collect those benefits by allowing the closure of post offices? I know it will be said that that is a matter for the Post Office, but will he use his good offices through the Department of Trade and Industry, his own Department and, indeed, the head of the Post Office service to ensure that pensioners' considerations are taken into account before any future closures?

Alan Johnson: That takes me back to Department of Trade and Industry questions when I started off as a Minister. I understand the importance of my hon. Friend's point. We are the first Government to provide £2 billion a year to protect the rural network and post offices in urban deprived areas. As for the rest of the network, sub-postmasters told us that they needed to ensure that they had the capability to make a proper living; otherwise they would go out of business. That is what the urban regeneration programme is about.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Will the Secretary of State publicly castigate a solvent foreign company that is threatening 400 of its former British employees with pension poverty? Has he seen the documents that I sent to his helpful Minister for Pensions from those pensioners, showing that Nikko Europe plc put its British pension scheme into wind-up in deficit on Christmas day 2001? Despite Nikko declaring profits last year of more than $400 million, it has so far declined to make good the deficit, as it could well afford to do, and is forcing those 400 deferred pensioners through a period of prolonged and acute anxiety.

Alan Johnson: I understand that the employer, as the hon. Gentleman said, is solvent. The hon. Gentleman has been in correspondence with my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions and now that he has raised the matter at Question Time, I will take a personal interest in it.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State realise that in his enthusiasm to counter pensioner poverty, the Liberal Democrats may have misread the answer that he gave at our last Question Time? Does he accept that while a citizenship pension might be a useful, additional tool to help the very oldest of our pensioners, it is not an avenue down which the Government are going, and that while our national insurance scheme has disadvantages, which need reform, reform will come in that direction and not via a citizenship pension?

Alan Johnson: That answer was not given at the last Department for Work and Pensions questions but during the Opposition day debate on pensions two days later. Let me make this point: the problem that I am interested in tackling, which Members on both sides of the House should be interested in tackling, is pensioner poverty. Two thirds of those in abject poverty are women, for the very good reason that they have not built up enough national insurance contributions. Fifty per cent. of women do not have a full state pension, compared with only 10 per cent. of men, and some women retiring now are in the same position. I reassure my right hon. Friend that we are determined to resolve that problem. The citizen's pension is one way of doing so—I have no wish, as I said recently to the Select Committee, to abrogate the contributory principle or to create more problems than we solve. I am concerned to overcome pensioner poverty, however, as we all should be, as it is a very real problem for millions of women in our society.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): May I ask the Secretary of State about another aspect of pensioner poverty? Tackling pensioner poverty in the future means insuring company pensions with an effective pension protection fund. We agree with the Government on that, but it would be perverse if a flat-rate levy penalised well-funded schemes. Will he tell the House today what position he will take on the defeats that the Government suffered in the other place last week? Will the Government seek to reverse their decision to introduce rapidly a risk-related levy that is significantly bigger than the flat-rate levy?

Alan Johnson: I have committed the Government, as has my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions on many occasions, to introduce a risk-based levy as soon as possible. We had opted for a different route towards that levy because of the practical problems that we had identified. I have not yet taken full cognizance of the decisions reached in the other place, but there is no disagreement between us on the need to move to a risk-based levy as soon as possible. I will examine the practical difficulties and seek to resolve those in accordance with the decisions made in the other place.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Irrespective of longer-term measures, perhaps such as a citizen's pension, will my right hon. Friend consider some quick changes now to help those women who will soon retire to have better basic state pensions: for instance, scrapping the 25 per cent. rule, under which any national insurance contributions of less than 10 years do not count towards a pension at all? Does he agree that that is unfair, that all contributions should count equally, and that that change could be brought about without primary legislation and without adding complexities to the pension system? That could help women who are about to retire to have a larger basic state pension of their own.

Alan Johnson: I recognise the contribution that my hon. and learned Friend has made in this regard. I shall consider her suggestion, and other constructive suggestions made by Members. The report on women's pensions that we are pledged to publish next year will allow us to do that. The Turner commission included a separate chapter on women's pensions, which was a very good move on the part of the Pensions Commission.

Child Support Agency

3. Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): When he expects to migrate existing Child Support Agency cases to the new maintenance assessment formula. [196322]

8. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): How many child support cases the Child Support Agency is dealing with under (a) the old rules and (b) the new system. [196323]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): The agency is working with EDS, the IT supplier, to resolve the problems with the computer system. We will make a decision on the transfer of old scheme cases once we are satisfied that the new scheme is working well. Currently around 326,000 cases are being dealt with under the new arrangements, with just over 1 million still subject to the old scheme.

Despite difficulties of which the House is well aware, the agency is still collecting £280 million more in child maintenance than it did in 1997–98.

Mr. Plaskitt: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer, but, as I am sure he is aware, it is broadly the same as the one that his Department has been giving since July 2003, when migration was supposed to start. It was supposed to be completed by April 2005.

As more new cases come on stream and are assessed under the new formula, we are fast approaching a point at which we shall be running two CSAs in parallel. That is not sustainable. Whose fault is it, and when will it be put right?

Mr. Pond: I acknowledge what my hon. Friend has said about the disappointment shared by all of us about the fact that we have not been able to make as much progress with the computer system as we wanted. That inevitably means that we cannot implement what all Members agree to be a much more effective system.

I do not think that this is the place in which to allocate blame. My hon. Friend will know that we have had robust discussions with EDS. We are disappointed that the scheme is not in a fit state for us to be sure that it can work properly for parents with care and non-resident carers, but I assure my hon. Friend that we are doing all we can to make the system work effectively as soon as possible.

Mr. Kidney: Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to state publicly that the CSA's job would be easier if all parents, rather than just some, accepted their responsibility to maintain their children? Will he also acknowledge that running two systems side by side makes the agency's job difficult? Making one system out of the two would benefit not only parents and children, but CSA staff.

Mr. Pond: My hon. Friend is right on both counts, but the most important point is that parents must take responsibility for the maintenance of their children. The CSA is there to ensure that that happens. If more non-resident parents took real responsibility, perhaps we would have less need for a CSA in any form. That could be described as a sad indictment.

My hon. Friend is also right on the second count. Inevitably, running two systems at the same time makes the whole arrangement more complex. That is why we—like my hon. Friend, who has made an important contribution—are keen to ensure that the new system is working properly and effectively as soon as possible.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): The Minister will know that in the case of a lone parent on income support under the old child support system, any maintenance that is collected is deducted pound for pound. Under the new system, a lone parent can keep a tenner a week. That means that every week in which the Minister fails to get a grip on the issue, some of the poorest children in the land lose £10. As the new system was introduced 18 months ago, some of those poor families have lost more than £700 because of his failure to get a grip.

Earlier this year, the former Secretary of State said that a recovery programme would be completed by the autumn. Did he mean this autumn, and has it been completed?

Mr. Pond: The hon. Gentleman will know that 33,000 families already receive the child maintenance premium. We want to ensure that all who are entitled—and 600,000 children would benefit—receive that help as quickly as possible. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is looking afresh at this and a number of other issues to ensure that we can make that happen. There is a difficulty at the moment but the child maintenance premium is a feature of the new system. It cannot operate under the old system, the old system rules or the old system legislation. We are looking at the matter afresh to see whether there are any other mechanisms that we can use to ensure that the children who need the help get it.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): I am glad that the Minister is not seeking to stand there and blame others for this Government shambles, but will he do what my constituents want him to do and accept ministerial responsibility for that shambles and give a definite deadline, which he will personally stand by, for when it will be cleared up?

Mr. Pond: No, I will not be giving any deadlines because I, my colleagues and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have made it clear that we will make the transfer to the new system only when we believe that it can really deliver effectively for non-resident parents, for parents with care and, most important, for children. I have said openly to the House that we share the disappointment of other hon. Members that we have not been able to make those moves as quickly as we expected. The Secretary of State said clearly to the Select Committee that he would like us to be moving ahead more quickly, but we have to be honest that we have not made the progress that we wanted to make. It would be highly irresponsible to try to transfer the old cases across until we are sure that the system is working properly.

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): I accept that it is a complex computer problem and that having two systems is unsatisfactory but the human effects are disturbing. I have been writing to the Minister since April about Mrs. Voros from Crofton, who has lost all the money for her and for her child. That is surely an unsatisfactory situation. When can we anticipate justice for such people?

Mr. Pond: My hon. Friend will understand that it is difficult to respond to individual cases on the Floor of the House. I can tell him, however, that we will certainly follow up cases in which constituents feel that the CSA is not providing an effective service. The CSA is committed to ensure that, as far as possible, the income from non-resident parents reaches the children who need that help as quickly and as effectively as possible. I will happily discuss with my hon. Friend the particular case that he has raised.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): A key witness to a recent Select Committee on Work and Pensions inquiry claimed that poor planning by the Department was responsible for over 2,000 change requests being made to the new computer system. The Select Committee has said that it is "profoundly dissatisfied" with the Government's response to its report, which cited that claim and others.

Will the Minister publish a full response to the Select Committee? If he does not, surely parents will conclude that the Department may have something to hide.

Mr. Pond: If the Department were trying to hide something, I would not be standing at the Dispatch Box now—[Interruption.] Well, I could stand here, but I would not be saying that we accept and understand the frustration felt not only in the House but by parents because the system is not working as effectively as it should. We will certainly respond to the comments made by the Select Committee, which we believe is making a real contribution to the debate. I can promise hon. Members that the Committee will get a constructive response from the Department in which it will seek to deal with the issues that the Committee has raised.

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): I have five constituents who moved from the old system to the new system, but now that the new system has failed they are on paper and pen systems. What they all want to know—all hon. Members are aware of similar problems—is when they will get their payment.

Mr. Pond: I can only reiterate what I said earlier. Where the technological difficulties can be worked around on a clerical basis, the agency is committed to doing that. Like all of us, it wants to ensure that the payments get to the children. If my hon. Friend has particular cases that he would like to discuss directly with me, I will happily pursue those on his behalf.

Unclaimed Assets

5. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the possible use of unused orphan funds in bank and building society accounts to assist members of collapsed occupational pension schemes. [196319]

11. Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): If he will use unclaimed assets to boost the funding of the financial assistance scheme. [196326]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): I refer hon. and right hon. Members to the reply by my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions on 4 July 2004. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made clear in the March Budget, we want as much as possible to reunite unclaimed assets with their rightful owners. Where the assets cannot be so reunited, they should be reinvested to benefit the whole of society. There are no plans to use such assets to provide assistance for people who have lost pensions.

Mr. Robathan: Apparently, there are some £15 billion-worth of unclaimed assets in dormant bank and building society accounts. As the Chancellor thinks that he can take the interest from such funds and give it to charities—which is sensible, assuming that the owners do not exist—will the Secretary of State not reconsider? Does he not realise that we all have constituents who have saved for all or part of their working lives yet, through no fault of their own, lost everything when their companies went bankrupt and their occupational pension schemes were lost? Is this not a good deserving case that the Minister should consider with some charity, for people in that desperate position?

Alan Johnson: We do not disagree about the problem faced by people who find their occupational pensions jeopardised, diluted or destroyed overnight. That is why we are introducing the pension protection fund and the financial assistance scheme. The hon. Gentleman is asking whether we should put the assets to which he referred into that scheme, and he mentioned a sum of £15 billion. That is disputed, particularly by the Building Societies Association, which summarised the problem when it described the policy of Her Majesty's official Opposition as follows:

> "This is an uncosted policy, as no thorough work has ever been undertaken as to the full amount held in lost accounts."

To quote Adrian Coles, the director general of the BSA:

> "At no point have we been consulted by the Conservative Party about this policy. We dispute the figures involved. We also strongly question the right of any organisation, government or otherwise"—

I think that the Conservative party falls under the description "otherwise"—

> "to take money from building society members. In addition, it is not clear under existing law whether this is even possible. But, most importantly, to promise pensioners compensation on the basis of an uncosted policy proposal is misleading and unfair."

I completely agree with that statement.

Mr. Lilley: I welcome the Secretary of State's decision to set up the financial assistance scheme, but does he not realise that it is untenable to do so on a basis that is not fully funded and does not cover all the potential victims of collapsed pension funds? Is it not therefore essential that he make use of the funds, rather than ridiculing the Chancellor's policy of making use of orphan funds for other purposes? If they are available for charity, they are available to the Secretary of State.

Alan Johnson: That is the last thing I was doing; I was quoting the Building Societies Association ridiculing the policy of the Opposition—

Mr. Lilley: That is the same thing.

Alan Johnson: No, it is not. Government Members believe that, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said in this year's Budget speech, we should invest those moneys for the good of society as a whole. As for the money that we have available for the financial assistance scheme, for the reasons set out by my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions in late June, we believe that we do have the opportunity to provide assistance. This is not compensation, and we do not accept any liability as a Government, but we are giving some assistance—not to the level that we are providing for the future, with the pension protection fund, but for the first time some help will be provided for those who have suffered in the past. The question is: should it come from the source that has been mentioned? We say no, it should not—and an awful lot of people who are politically neutral say the same thing.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that we have been talking about orphan funds for a very long time? I thought that our Government—the new Labour Government—were supposed to be a radical Government. If they are, why do we not get on and do the research, knock some heads together, talk to the Treasury and get this sorted, whatever we use the funds for? Personally, I would like it to go to the pensioners who have lost their pensions, and I do not consider that to be a party political matter. But whatever we use the money for, let us get on with it, rather than sitting and talking about it.

Alan Johnson: I accept that my hon. Friend, who asks us to be radical, holds very strong views, and work is continuing. However, this is not a matter for my Department, and I suggest that he turn up at Treasury questions; indeed, as I understand it various opportunities are coming up to question Treasury Ministers on how far they have got. As Adrian Coles of the Building Societies Association pointed out, we are talking about other people's money, and for us to blunder in without giving the matter the most adroit and careful consideration would be a huge mistake. We are moving as quickly as we can in such a complex area.

Sandra Osborne (Ayr) (Lab): Surely the important point is that the Government have promised substantial help for those who have lost their pensions. However, my constituents are getting understandably impatient to find out exactly what assistance they will receive. What is the time scale for hearing more details about the pension assistance fund, and will my right hon. Friend meet my constituents to discuss this issue?

Alan Johnson: I certainly will. We are exactly on course with the statement made by my right hon. Friend my predecessor to Parliament in May, and we are on track in terms of the comprehensive statement made to Parliament on 30 June. Looking back year by year at the liabilities and assets of pension funds and schemes is another really complex issue. We said that by the end of November, we will be able to start consulting on the detail, and we are still on course to do so. We are also on course to have a scheme up and running by next spring, so when I meet my hon. Friend and her constituents I will be able to reassure them that that timetable is still on track.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): I will not be joining the Secretary of State in his unprovoked attack on the Chancellor, but what possible distinction can there be in principle or practice between using—with proper safeguards—unclaimed assets to assist charities, and using them to help people who have lost their pensions through no fault of their own? Can he see any reason at all in principle why people falling within his financial assistance scheme should not receive the same level of benefits as those covered by the PPF?

Alan Johnson: I find it amazing that the Conservatives are now saying how important this issue is, given that they voted against the Pensions Bill on Second Reading.

Mr. Waterson indicated dissent.

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but it is a matter of record. [Interruption.] I am told from a sedentary position that they declined to give the Pensions Bill a Second Reading; I am sorry if that is hugely different from their saying that they refused to back it. The simple fact is that we believe that the orphan funds should be used for the good of society as a whole, and we will proceed very carefully in that direction. We believe that people who have lost money in pension schemes in the past should be given some level of assistance; however, we do not think it viable or sensible for us to promise the same level of assistance in future, through a pension protection fund that is set up to generate funds to ensure that it meets its liabilities. In looking at the past and offering assistance rather than compensation, we should be absolutely clear that the pension protection fund will not be able to offer 100 per cent. and 90 per cent. coverage in the same way.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): I have had several occupational pension schemes go wrong in my constituency, including Bellings' scheme, which was swindled by fraud in 1992. Will my right hon. Friend recognise that one of the biggest concerns of all those involved in such schemes is that when something goes wrong, the administrators, lawyers and legal people make so much money that the funds diminish and they do not get the pensions that they want? In fact, in some instances a bad position gradually gets worse.

Alan Johnson: I accept that that is a problem, and similar difficulties have arisen with schemes in my own constituency. Of course, some changes have already been made and importantly, schemes that start to wind up after 10 May 2004 will benefit from a change in the priority order. The sector as a whole needs to look at this issue, and the pension protection fund needs to examine the issue of how much money is being spent and is being taken away from pensioners, rather than being dedicated to them.

Pension Credit

6. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What recent representations he has received on erroneous payments of pension credit. [196320]

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): From time to time, there are individual errors in the payment of pension credit, but overall accuracy is good. Pension credit payment accuracy levels were running to target at around 94 per cent. during August and September, for example. The Pension Service aspires to provide the best possible level of service and accuracy at all times.

Miss McIntosh: To what extent does the Minister attribute the erroneous contributions made to constituents in the Vale of York to the closure, after opening only two years ago, of the pensions office in York and its relocation to Dundee? What else can be attributed to the fact that he has unnecessarily chosen the most complicated formula, ensuring that he rewards only those who have failed to save throughout their working lives?

Malcolm Wicks: On the hon. Lady's final point, I am proud of the fact that, at long last, we have a system of assistance that rewards rather than penalises modest savings. Under the old system presided over by the Conservative Government, people were penalised pound for pound for any money they saved, so we are making progress on the savings incentive.

On the question of erroneous payments, I do not think that we have been in correspondence about any particular problems in the Vale of York. If there has been correspondence, I apologise and undertake to look further into it. I am proud of the fact, however, that 3,000 pensioner households in the Vale of York are now receiving pension credit. I hope that the hon. Lady will also be pleased about that and will congratulate our excellent Pension Service on that result.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): The Minister will be aware of the unhappiness felt by many pensioners who lose their pension credit if they spend more than four weeks out of the country. They may have scrimped and saved to go abroad to meet other family members, for example, but on their return they are faced with bills to pay back their credit. Will the Minister take steps to extend the amount of time that pensioners are able to spend outside the country before they lose their pension credit? The period should be extended to help them.

Malcolm Wicks: Yes, we need to look further into that and, indeed, we are reviewing it. I am sympathetic to the point that my hon. Friend raises. Obviously, I will have to consider any resource implications. We also need to make it absolutely clear that this is not an exportable benefit, but one that exists for people who are resident in this country. As I say, we are looking very vigorously into that matter.

Sir Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (LD): Does the Minister agree that one of the best ways of ensuring that pension credit payments are accurate is having a properly staffed and resourced local pension service? When the right hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) sold the idea of pension credit to the House, he strongly supported the idea of developing pension services locally. Can the Minister provide an assurance that despite the incidence of staff cuts, which the Government are working through, staffing levels for local pension services will be protected; otherwise, the erroneous payments will continue and get even worse?

Malcolm Wicks: We need to safeguard local pension services. It is a tough decision, but we are right to expect that, in future, we can run an efficient Pension Service with fewer staff. That is an important efficiency saving. However, at the local level, 638,000 home visits have been made and advice surgeries have seen 448,000 customers, so the local service is important and we will safeguard it.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): Has my hon. Friend conducted any satisfaction surveys of pensioners in receipt of pension credit, which would help us to understand what pensioners believe is the most appropriate way of assisting them?

Malcolm Wicks: Customer satisfaction surveys are running, if I remember correctly, at about 80 per cent.— a high level of satisfaction. We listen to all shades of opinion on the success of pension credit and the Pension Service, but I am sure the House would agree that we should listen most to our customers, who are satisfied. We are also satisfied, but not complacent. When we can improve matters, we will do so.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): Those, of course, are the customers who have managed to get through the incredibly complicated procedure and managed finally to secure the pension credit. The figures do not include the 1.7 million pensioners who are not receiving the pension to which they are entitled.

What would the Minister say to the pensioner who contacted the citizens advice bureau after applying for pension credit and receiving a letter from the Pension Service, which stated:

> "From 22 January 1811 you will get £163,168.66 a week"?

Is not that absurd? Does it not show that a system as complicated as the one introduced by the Minister is prone to error, leads to high administration costs and fails to get help to the pensioners who really need it?

Malcolm Wicks: The pension credit is a great social advance, although in that individual case it was an advance too far. If the hon. Gentleman's accusation is that, in a system that deals with millions of people and pieces of information, we occasionally make mistakes, well yes, we do. However, I am proud of the fact that the customer satisfaction level is high. Indeed, it is much higher than the satisfaction level with the British Conservative party.

Mr. Willetts: We are getting confused messages from the Government. The Secretary of State thinks out loud about the future of means-tested benefits. Indeed, I have not heard him defend means-testing and the pension credit in his new role at the Dispatch Box. Every time he appears, he offers some new criticism of the system that he is supposed to be defending. Now the Minister of State tries to maintain that the pension credit is a success. Does he really believe that the pension credit is the right long-term solution to Britain's pension crisis?

Malcolm Wicks: The right long-term solution is to ensure that more of our citizens in the future, including young workers today, retire on pension incomes above means-tested levels, through a combination of state pensions and private or occupational pensions. However, while there is a major problem of pensioner hardship and poverty, pension credit will have a significant role to play. As for the charge of complexity, under a previous Tory Government people had to fill in a very long form: the form is now shorter. Under a Tory Government, people could not apply over the telephone: under a Labour Government, they can. Finally, under a Tory Government, the Pension Service did not exist and there were no home visits: our system makes it easy for the customer. I am proud of our record. I hope that he is ashamed of his.

Pension Service

9. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): If he will make a statement on the administration of the Pension Service. [196324]

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): The Pension Service is making good progress—as we have just heard—against its target of improving delivery to customers. I always appreciate a planted question at this stage. We made an announcement on 29 June about plans for business transformation to secure high levels of service with increased efficiency in the Pension Service as part of wider efficiency gains in the Department.

Andrew Selous: If the Pension Service is indeed making such good progress, perhaps the Minister can explain why one of my constituents had to receive seven letters from the Pension Service before it could organise direct payment into her bank account, the last letter being in Welsh. I am aware that the European Union managed to lose Wales from the map of the United Kingdom, but does the Department for Work and Pensions think that it has arrived in south Bedfordshire?

Malcolm Wicks: We are a joined-up Government and we always seek to improve language skills wherever possible. If one of the hon. Gentleman's constituents has received too many letters from us, I apologise. I would be grateful if he would let me have the details. However, this Government do not expect a single pensioner to live on £69 a week, as the Tories did. We have a guaranteed income of £105 for a single person. The vast majority of those entitled to the pension guarantee receive it. We are attacking pensioner poverty and I am proud of that: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is, too.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I know that my hon. Friend is a keen follower of Wolverhampton Wanderers football club and will be aware that it seeks a new manager. Is he also aware that Jane Whitaker, the excellent and much more successful manager of the Pension Service in Wolverhampton, is also looking for a job because the DWP proposes to close the pension centre in the town? It has met and beaten its targets and has even taken in work from elsewhere in the UK, but the Department still proposes to close it. Will my hon. Friend reconsider that decision?

Malcolm Wicks: We do have in common the support of a certain football club and I am pleased to answer as an old-fashioned inside left. We need to make efficiency savings. If we are to convince the British public—as we will—that we can have a modern welfare state for the 21st century, it needs to be efficiently run. We needed to build up our staff to launch the pension credit successfully and we now need an efficient service. Wherever possible, we will redeploy people within the Department or elsewhere in government. We have had some success in that already and we will find other uses for pension centres that will not be required for the Pension Service in the future.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): If the civil servants operating the Pension Service have done such a marvellous job, should not the Minister move them to the Child Support Agency?

Malcolm Wicks: It is always useful to have some light relief. We are determined that all our public agencies should be run efficiently. That is true for the Pension Service and it must also be true for the Child Support Agency. We realise that a challenge faces the agency, and we must meet that challenge for the sake of lone mothers—and, indeed, some lone fathers—who are being let down by the other parent and who need that support for the sake of their children.

Incapacity Benefit

10. Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): How many people are claiming incapacity benefit in Newcastle-under-Lyme. [196325]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): There are 4,500 people in Newcastle-under-Lyme claiming incapacity benefit. We are the first Government to try to help people on incapacity benefit who want to work to do so. We have already made progress, particularly through Jobcentre Plus, the new deals, and our flagship reform programme, pathways to work.

Paul Farrelly: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is she aware that in constituencies such as mine a great number of people are on incapacity benefit due to the ravages of industries such as mining, pottery and steel? Clearly, in north Staffordshire we welcome the Government's support for programmes such as the job guarantee programme in Stoke, which is helping people off benefit and back into work, in line with pathways to work, but does she recognise that long-term claimants are deeply worried about the prospect of compulsory interviews? If those interviews are brought in, will she ensure that the Government show their sensitive side so that people are not dealt with in the same way as the many disability living allowance claimants who approach MPs for help week in, week out?

Maria Eagle: I will take up the DLA point with my hon. Friend on another occasion. I accept fully his opening point that there are higher levels of sickness and incapacity for occupational reasons in some areas, including his own. The pathways initiative is voluntary for long-term claimants. There is no compulsory element for those who have been on incapacity benefit for many years, many of whom, we find, volunteer to receive the help that the programme offers. We also find that compulsion is not an issue in practice. Most people who are concerned about the compulsory nature of the work-focused interview are reassured once they attend the first interview. Similarly, our condition management programme providers are not concerned about the impact that the compulsory element of attendance may have, especially in respect of mental health; nor are individuals who come to us, once they understand the nature of the process. I hope that I can reassure my hon. Friend that the compulsion element, which is supported by disability organisations countrywide, is not proving to be the concern that he fears.

Unemployment (Bulwell)

12. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): If he will visit the Bulwell jobcentre to discuss trends in unemployment rates in the area. [196328]

The Minister for Work (Jane Kennedy): Regrettably, I am not planning on visiting Bulwell jobcentre in the near future, unlike my hon. Friend who visited it last week and took that opportunity to compliment the staff and congratulate them on achieving a regional performance award for their very hard and excellent work. However, I am pleased to say that as a result of our well-proven labour market policies, long-term unemployment in my hon. Friend's constituency has fallen by 69 per cent.

Mr. Allen: I am not surprised that my right hon. Friend does not want to visit the Bulwell jobcentre in my constituency, because I have not wanted to visit it for nearly 18 months—even as an assiduous constituency Member of Parliament—whereas in 1997 I visited the office so often that I was invited to the leaving party for its then manager. Does not that prove to my hon. Friend what a brilliant success the new deal has been throughout the land? Will she make it clear that we intend not only to sustain the new deal, but to extend it wherever possible, to ensure that unemployment becomes an issue for all the right reasons, as it never was in the early days of the Government?

Jane Kennedy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those comments. He is right: the new deal programmes have been a well-proven success. More than 3,000 people have been helped into work through the new deal in Nottingham, North and more than 65,000 in the east midlands. Their lives have been changed through their experience of the new deal.

Progress2work Scheme

13. John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): How many progress2work clients have maintained full-time work for over 12 months since joining the scheme. [196329]

The Minister for Work (Jane Kennedy): Jobcentre Plus delivers progress2work, which helps those people who have misused illegal drugs to overcome difficult barriers to enter employment. I can tell my hon. Friend that more than 3,000 people with a history of drug misuse have been helped into work through the progress2work programme, and more than 1,000 of them are still in work after three months or more.

John Mann: That was not quite an answer to the question that I tabled today, and I look forward to receiving the actual answer. Does the Minister recognise that constituencies such as mine, which have a significant and successful drugs treatment programme, need the help of her Department to get people back to work? Is she prepared to meet a delegation of experts from my constituency who have prepared alternative plans on how to get people back to work because of the failures of progress2work?

Jane Kennedy: I am disappointed to hear my hon. Friend describe progress2work as a failure. In north Nottinghamshire, 85 per cent. of those people helped into work through progress2work are still in work more than three months later. His question relates to 12 months, and he knows from informal discussions that although we do not yet have evaluations for the one-year point, it is still a mark of success when individuals with the difficulties faced by those people who take part in the progress2work scheme are continuing to work after three months. Indeed, a 23-year-old man who had used heroin for six years and had been in prison for three month has now been off heroin for six months. He is on methadone, but he is working. He has achieved his driving licence and forklift licence to maintain work, and he is still in work after six months. That is one of the individual success stories that tell me that progress2work is having the expected results. However, I would be very pleased to meet my hon. Friend and his delegation to talk about this crucial issue.

Pathways to Work Pilots

14. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the pathways to work pilots; and if he will make a statement. [196330]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): Pathways to work pilots are subject to ongoing evaluation. The early indications are extremely encouraging. As my right hon. friend the Secretary of State announced recently, pathways areas are getting double the level of improvement in the number of recorded job entries compared with other areas, and about six times as many people as in other places are taking up further help to get back to work.

Lynne Jones: I commend all those involved in the development of the programme, which I saw for myself on a visit to Derbyshire in the summer. The sooner that it operates in my constituency, the better. Does my hon. Friend agree that the holistic approach that the programme represents is far more likely to achieve long-term success than the punitive approach of threatening people with the loss of benefits? It is far more likely to be successful in getting people on incapacity benefit back into the world of work, particularly those who have mental health problems.

Maria Eagle: I understand my hon. Friend's point. I am glad that she was able to see pathways to work working in Derby, and I, too, hope that we can extend it to her constituency and other places as soon as possible. I know that she is chair of the all-party parliamentary group on mental health and understand her concern about the impact of compulsion, but I am a great supporter of compulsion in respect of the work-focused interview. There are safeguards to ensure that vulnerable people are not sanctioned if they do not turn up. It is absolutely crucial that people who have often been away from the jobs market and Jobcentre Plus for very many years get to see what kind of help can be offered. Many of them are surprised at the supportive way in which our staff can take them forward. Unless we get them in, we cannot help them get into work. So, the approach balances the rights of those individuals to be helped to get work with the responsibilities of having to turn up for the interviews.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Although my local Jobcentre Plus has done a great deal to help disabled people into work, the extra help and the holistic approach mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynne Jones) is not available, particularly in respect of the help that exists elsewhere through access to the rehabilitation service. Will my hon. Friend the Minister go further and say when pathways to work will be rolled out across the country, so that my constituents can benefit from the extra help that it provides?

Maria Eagle: Pathways to work is a pilot programme. Until very recently, no one knew how to assist that group of people to get back into the labour market. We need to ensure that we spend the money in the right way to get results. Therefore, despite the fact that the early indications are very encouraging—we are very excited about them—we do not yet know what the impact of the pilot schemes will be in respect of sustained job entries, for example. We need to ensure that we go forward on the basis of evidence. Only when we have that evidence—it is appearing all the time—will we be able to judge when and, indeed, if we can extend that approach elsewhere.

Faversham Jobcentre

15. Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future of Faversham jobcentre. [196331]

The Minister for Work (Jane Kennedy): The hon. Gentleman and I have discussed the future of Faversham jobcentre before. He knows that by 2006 we will have completed the roll-out of the Jobcentre Plus network and will be delivering radically improved services to all our customers. However, he knows, because I wrote to him on 3 November, that the existing jobcentre in Faversham is unfortunately not suitable for conversion to one of the new style offices, so we intend to provide our enhanced services from our Sittingbourne office, where many of our Faversham customers already go.

Hugh Robertson: I thank the Minister for her letter, if not the news that it contained. She will understand that the loss of the five days a week service and its replacement with one half day is causing a great deal of local anguish. Is there any way in which she can increase the number of days on which a face-to-face service is available? Will she assure me that no steps will be taken to close Faversham jobcentre before the new service at Sittingbourne is up and running?

Jane Kennedy: I will look at the detail again. However, the hon. Gentleman knows that there are only 620 claimants in his constituency, which is down 60 per cent. on the figure in 1997. Jobcentre Plus is not about only new offices. He rightly asks whether we can ensure that the new way in which services will be delivered will be sufficient to address the requirements placed upon them. I will look into the matter that he raised today. We will offer services outside jobcentres in such places as local surgeries and shared sites with local authorities to meet the needs of our local customers. I will look again at the number of days on which services will be available in Faversham.

Child Support Agency

17. Mr Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich West) (Lab/Co-op): What assessment he has made of the new Child Support Agency calculation scheme for maintenance payments; and if he will make a statement. [196333]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): I was anxious that I might not get a further opportunity this afternoon to get to the Dispatch Box to talk about the Child Support Agency.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made regular progress reports to the House, the latest being on 28 October. More than 230,000 cases have been cleared under the new arrangements and more than 33,000 of the poorest families are benefiting from the new child maintenance premium. Customers and staff confirm that when it works well, they like the simplicity of the new scheme.

Mr. Bailey: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. One of the results of the welcome simplification and transparency of the new scheme is that parents who are paying under the old scheme can access the website to calculate what their payments would be under the new scheme. However, they then of course find that they will not graduate on to the new scheme until some date in the future that is yet to be determined. Will he reassure my constituents and me that they will graduate at the earliest possible opportunity?

Mr. Pond: Of course we understand that the new scheme's transparency is attractive, which is why the whole House wants us to move towards it as quickly as possible. I understand that parents who want to move on to the new scheme quickly are frustrated because they do not know the date on which that will happen. If one parent is anxious to move on to the new scheme, it probably means that the other parent will lose significantly. However, I must make it clear that even after we have made the decision to move across to the new scheme, phasing arrangements will apply, which will mean that people will not move immediately on to new assessments. I reassure my hon. Friend that we will move on to the new scheme as soon as possible after we are sure that the new system is working properly.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): That answer will not help people who are trying to work out what will happen to them. Our constituents need to plan their lives and finances. Can the Minister give them any idea of what "as soon as practically possible" means? What sort of phasing time scale does he expect to apply? Has he worked out at least the phasing part so that our constituents can understand how long the phasing will last?

Mr. Pond: Yes—the phasing arrangements are already well publicised. We reckon that 80 per cent. of cases, even with phasing, will move on to the new assessment within three years, although the change will take up to five years for others. That process is designed to ensure that people will not face large changes to their liabilities or assessments, but, again, I am afraid that I cannot give the hon. Gentleman or the House a clear date on which we will be able to begin the process. I wish that I could.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): It is a tremendous achievement when the CSA secures the information to carry out the assessment. It is an even greater achievement when the non-resident parent makes the payments. The ex-partner of one of my constituents has been making payments to the CSA since June, yet she has not received a single penny. If I pass information on that case on to my hon. Friend, will he endeavour to secure the release of those funds at the earliest opportunity?

Mr. Pond: The agency is committed to passing on those payments as quickly as possible so that the children for whom they are intended get that help as soon as possible. There may be circumstances in which it cannot pass them on, sometimes because it does not have sufficient information on the intended recipient of the payment or it is waiting for clearance from bank accounts. However, I assure my hon. Friend that if he brings that case to me, I shall look at it carefully.

EU Summit

3.30 pm

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement on the European Council that took place in Brussels on 4 and 5 November.

I should like to thank Prime Minister Balkenende and the Dutch Government for their arrangements for the summit, and for the way in which they have conducted their presidency to date. The Council was inevitably dominated by Iraq, given the presence of Dr. Allawi, the Iraqi Prime Minister.

First, let me express what I know will be the sentiments of the entire House in sending our profound condolences to the families of the Black Watch soldiers killed by a terrorist bomb in Iraq last week and our sympathy to those soldiers injured yesterday in another terrorist attack. We salute their dedication, professionalism and, above all, sheer and undaunted courage. They are an example to us all and we can and should be very proud of them.

Let us also be very clear about the fundamental importance to Britain's security of what the Black Watch and, indeed, the British armed forces in the south of Iraq are doing. Defeat of terrorism in Iraq is defeat for this new and virulent form of global terrorism everywhere. A democratic Iraq is the last thing the terrorists want to see. It is precisely for that reason—because victory for the terrorists would damage security around the world, including here in Britain—that we have to hold firm, be resolute and see this through, including in Falluja.

The action by allied and Iraqi forces under way in Falluja would cease now, immediately, if the terrorists and insurgents who are using Falluja as a base for terrorism laid down their weapons and agreed to participate in the elections. Over the past few months, as he explained today, Prime Minister Allawi has tried to persuade them to do so. They have refused, not because they are fighting a foreign occupation—if the terrorism stopped, American, British and other troops would leave Iraq—but because they are fighting democracy. They are fighting to stop democratic elections, supervised by the UN and due to take place in January. They know that while Falluja remains outside the control of the UN-endorsed Government, they can use it to wreck elections. Why do the terrorists fear elections? Because they know that given the chance to vote for their own Government, Iraqis would reject the extremism and fanaticism these terrorists represent.

The powerful speech made by Dr. Allawi to the European Council made precisely those points. He appealed for Europe's help. Some promised support of a military nature; others promised only financial support. But all of the Council agreed that it was in the interests of global security for Iraqi elections to take place. The Council also agreed a comprehensive package of EU assistance for Iraq, including a further programme of financial and logistical support for the elections, and financing for the UN protection force. This is on top of €300 million of humanitarian and reconstruction support from the EU over the past two years.

Following the re-election of President Bush, the Council also agreed that a close transatlantic partnership was fundamental to building international peace, security and prosperity, and that we now need to strengthen that alliance so that we can intensify our work together in addressing the main international threats and challenges of the moment, including regional conflicts, terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

The Council also heard a presentation from the former Prime Minister of the Netherlands, Wim Kok, on his mid-term review of the Lisbon strategy on European economic competitiveness. He rightly concluded that Europe has to do far more to improve its underlying economic performance if it is to respond to the challenges of Asia and the United States, and he sensibly highlighted the importance of completing the single market, developing flexible labour markets, and promoting sustainable growth. The Council adopted a new five-year work programme of measures in the area of justice and home affairs. There are great benefits for the UK in co-operation with our European partners on these issues. Illegal immigration affects all member states. However, the opt-in protocol for Britain—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Bellingham, you had better be quiet, otherwise I will put you out of the Chamber.

The Prime Minister: The opt-in protocol for Britain, negotiated in Amsterdam in 1997, remains. It is also enshrined in the new constitutional treaty. We have used it successfully over the past five years to opt in to new measures on asylum and combating illegal immigration, and to opt out of measures on legal migration, frontiers and visas. The protocol gives us the right to decide whether to participate in each item of the EU work programme and makes nonsense of claims that Britain has given up the right to control its own borders. If, of course, we opt in because we want a particular measure, it is in our interests that in a Europe of 25 and soon 27 or 28 countries the use of a veto by another country cannot block the measure.

Finally, the President-designate of the Commission, José Manuel Barroso, briefed us on his proposals for restructuring the new Commission. He has reacted decisively to resolve the dispute with the European Parliament, and I am confident that as a result the new Commission will be able to take office soon. In summary, the meeting once again underlined the importance to Britain of maintaining both a strong relationship with the United States of America and a strong place in the Councils of the European Union. Both partnerships are vital to the British national interest and it will remain the policy of this Government at least to nurture both.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I join the Prime Minister in expressing our deepest sympathy to the families of the soldiers of the Black Watch who have lost their lives and our good wishes for a speedy recovery to those who have been injured. I join, too, in the tribute that the Prime Minister paid to the outstanding dedication, professionalism and courage of the Black Watch.

I welcome both the European Council's discussions with Prime Minister Allawi and the financial contribution towards elections in Iraq. I support everything that the Prime Minister said about the importance of defeating terrorism in Iraq and elsewhere. Events in Samarra have shown that bringing an area under ostensible control does not, sadly, always mean an end to insurgency. Can the Prime Minister tell the House as much as he can about the coalition's plans to deal with the situation that is likely to arise in Iraq after the battle for Falluja?

I welcome the Council's agreement on the importance of a close transatlantic partnership and on the need to strengthen the alliance. What specific proposals does the Prime Minister have to bring that about? The communiqué emphasises the middle east peace process, although his statement was silent on the subject. Is it not time to turn again to the road map? Should we not now seize the moment to make real progress on the ground towards a secure Israel within internationally recognised borders and a viable Palestinian state?

The European Council also discussed Iran's nuclear programme. Has preliminary agreement been reached on that issue with Iran? In the past, Iran has not complied with the undertakings that it has given, so what measures are proposed to make sure that it does so this time? The communiqué also expresses grave concern about Darfur. Has not the time come for immediate United Nations action, including automatic sanctions, to ensure that the Sudanese Government reign in the militias? Should not the African Union forces be given the mission to keep the peace, rather than just monitor the situation, to put an end to the dreadful attacks on civilians that still continue in that area?

The Prime Minister has boasted endlessly about progress on economic reform in Europe. In 1998, he said

"We have to reform Europe and we are winning that battle".

In 2000, he said that there had been

"a sea change in European economic thinking . . . away from heavy-handed intervention and regulation, towards a new approach based on enterprise, innovation and competition."—[Official Report, 27 March 2000; Vol. 347, c. 21.]

But is not that all talk? Has not Romano Prodi admitted that economic reform in Europe has been a "big failure"? Has not the director general of the CBI said that Europe has got to change? Has not Wim Kok said that "too many targets will be seriously missed"?

The aim of the Lisbon agenda was to make Europe the most dynamic economy in the world by 2010. Is not that just a pipe dream? Will not we all pay the price in terms of lower productivity, lower living standards and fewer jobs?

Promises on economic reform are not the only areas where the Prime Minister has been all talk. Four years ago, he said that he did not want a "single, legally binding document called a Constitution"

yet that is exactly what he signed a week ago. The director general of the CBI has said that the constitution will not help business. The Prime Minister's own former chief economic adviser has said that it will

"entrench Europe's economic failings and drag Britain down too".

[Interruption.] Well, this was someone to whom the Prime Minister listened for six and a half years, so I think that his views might be entitled to a modicum of respect. Is not it the case that the constitution will make Europe's economy even less flexible, even less competitive and even more sluggish than it is today?

Earlier this year, the Prime Minister promised that "we will retain completely our control over our asylum policy".

But was not that promise all talk? At the summit, a "common European asylum system" was agreed. The communiqué that the Prime Minister signed says:

"the Constitutional Treaty greatly increases the powers of the European Court of Justice in that area".

Does not that mean in plain English that more and more decisions on asylum and immigration will no longer be taken in this elected Parliament, but will in future be taken by the unelected judges of the European Court? It is no good the Prime Minister's talking about opt-outs when he has chosen to opt into all the major measures on asylum.

Is not all this a huge lost opportunity? Are not there practical policies that would turn some of the Prime Minister's rhetoric into action? If the Prime Minister means what he says about listening to people on Europe, why will not he match our pledge to set a date next year for the referendum on the constitution so that the people can have their say? If he means what he says about a modern Europe, why does not he put the case for greater flexibility, including the return of powers from Brussels to Britain so that we are no longer forced to accept so many new regulations that we do not support?

In 1997, the Prime Minister promised to "lead a campaign for reform in Europe".

Seven and a half years later, in a diverse Union of 25, and in a fiercely competitive world, is not the need for a modern, flexible, reformed European Union more urgent than ever and under this Prime Minister, despite all his talk, are not we further away from it than we have ever been before?

The Prime Minister: First, let me deal with the questions on Iraq. In respect of Samarra, Najaf, Tal Afar and other places that have been taken back into the control of the Iraqi Government and Iraqi forces, it is of course true that terrorists will carry on actions in those places, as they did in Samarra just a few days ago.

There are a couple of interesting points, however. When those terrorists have been cleared out of these cities, it has become very obvious, contrary to what we were told beforehand, that they did not enjoy the support of local people; on the contrary, local people were all too glad to get rid of them so that they could get back to the lives that they wanted to lead.

Let us be clear that the purpose of the action in Falluja is to stop it being used as a base for terrorists and insurgents who are killing innocent people in Iraq and anybody who tries to make the country better. If and when we take back control of Falluja so that it is in the control of the Iraqi Government, a process of reconstruction will follow, as happened in Samarra and Najaf, where literally hundreds of millions of dollars are being spent on reconstruction projects. The people can then participate fully in the elections. I do not minimise the difficulties but it is essential for the holding of democratic, free and fair elections that the power and grip of the terrorists and insurgents in some parts of Iraq be broken. That is why Prime Minister Allawi has authorised the operations.

It is extremely important that we make progress on the middle east now. Progress must be towards a two-state solution; an Israel confident about its security and a viable, independent Palestinian state. It is essential to take measures to make progress on that. I hope that we shall do that as soon as possible. As I said when I congratulated President Bush on his re-election, it is the single most pressing political challenge of the moment.

We are still at the point of negotiation on Iran. A series of issues has been agreed at political director level, but not yet at intergovernmental level between the European three—France, Germany and the United Kingdom—and the Iranian Government but we are hopeful that we will be able to make some progress in the next few days.

On Sudan, it is important to make it clear that not only the Sudanese Government should exercise restraint; some of the Sudanese rebel groups must do so. A series of measures has been laid down for the Sudanese Government and they must follow them. If they do not, there has to be reference to the Security Council and necessary measures must be taken.

I agree with the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) that the African Union should not only increase the number of troops available there but make it clear that, if possible, it can keep the peace as well as monitor what is happening there. However, it is a difficult and delicate situation for the troops that are going into it. We are watching the situation carefully. My right hon. Friends the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for International Development are in constant touch with their opposite numbers in other capitals and with the Sudanese Government. However, the situation remains serious. If anything, it has got worse rather than better in the past few weeks. If we do not get obedience and compliance with the measures that the international community laid down, we will have to revert to the matter at Security Council level and take action.

It is worth pointing out that, since 1999, some 6 million jobs have been created in Europe and liberalisation has taken place in many sectors under the Lisbon strategy process. I agree that it is important that we do more but the right hon. and learned Gentleman's policy of being a semi-marginalised player in Europe will not help to get economic reform. As for the woeful things that he claims will happen if the EU constitution is passed, I merely point out that he used to make the same predictions when he was Secretary of State for Employment in the previous Government about the social chapter. I think I remember his saying that 500,000 jobs would desert Britain if we signed the social chapter. We signed it and 2 million extra jobs have been created since. His powers of prediction are not good.

I am surprised that the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposes our opt-in on asylum. A few months ago, he made a speech in which he said that a process whereby countries decided whether to opt in to specific measures was precisely the direction in which Europe wanted to go. We have delivered that, but the moment that we do so, he switches around 180°, in his usual opportunistic fashion, and says that it is a disaster for the country.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned the charter of rights. Let me read part of our protocol to him. It states:

> "No decision of the Court of Justice interpreting any such provision"— to do with asylum and immigration—

> "shall be binding upon or applicable in the United Kingdom."

That destroys the effect of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's point. As for his view that we should have a bold strategy of renegotiating the existing membership of the European Union, it is, as some his hon. Friends have pointed out, simply not on the table. He would have to get the agreement of every one of the other members to renegotiate that. How many members have agreed? [HON. MEMBERS: "Norway."] I think we are back to the Norway issue.

Following the right hon. and learned Gentleman's comments at the weekend, it is extraordinary that, in his first year as Conservative leader, he has managed to achieve a foreign policy position that would make us a marginalised member of the European Union and not welcome in the White House either. Only his leadership could have brought the Conservative conception of foreign policy to such a pass.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): I thank the Prime Minister for his statement. May I join him, on behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, in extending our condolences to the families of the Black Watch personnel who have been killed or injured, as well as to those of the very brave civilians who are giving their support and assistance to the Black Watch in their extremely dangerous job? The families not only of serving Black Watch personnel but of the Scots Guards, who have reportedly been placed on replacement standby, would welcome some clarification of the Government's position on possible replacement forces, given that they are clearly adhering to their view that the Black Watch will be home by Christmas. The House and the families concerned would welcome any clarification that the Prime Minister can give them on that issue, not least because there were contradictory reports in the media this weekend on whether replacement forces would be deployed at the end of this period.

Whatever the original principled disagreements over the basis for the war, and, indeed, the more recent divergences of view over what many of us regarded as a strategic political and military shift over the Black Watch deployment, there is obviously consensus on wanting to see the democratic timetable and an independent Iraq achieved, and on our having no truck with terrorism. I am sure that the Prime Minister will acknowledge, however, that the real concerns over this American-led assault on Falluja—not least in terms of the civilian casualties involved—give rise to fair and legitimate questions. These questions have been raised on the international stage by Kofi Annan, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and they are also arising within the Iraqi interim Government, not least in the different viewpoints now being expressed by the Prime Minister and the President there.

Does the Prime Minister agree that, whatever the events of the next few days and weeks in Falluja, it is essential that the Americans' conduct does not squander any moral capital or undermine the legitimacy of the democratic process, especially if that were to result in a Sunni boycott of any elections taking place in January? On a practical as well as moral level, will the Prime Minister address the question of what contingency plans have been put in place to deal with those insurgents who have already fled Falluja, or who will in due course be flushed out of the city and move to other parts of the country, perhaps to carry on their notorious activities there? Formal hostilities in Falluja are commencing as we speak, so I am sure that the Prime Minister will acknowledge that these are responsible questions to which the House will genuinely want to return in due course.

On the allied issue of Iran, the Prime Minister has already responded to some of the discussions that have taken place. He has an important summit meeting coming up later this week with President Bush, which is surely welcome, given the agenda that will be in front of them. If, as he suggested a moment ago, further discussions among the three European powers—the United Kingdom, France and Germany—will be taking place over the next few days, is he hopeful that he will be in a position to ask the President to endorse the strategy of these three countries in regard to Iran later this week in Washington? On completion of that summit meeting, does he intend to return to the House with a further statement of this kind, perhaps this time next week, to enable further discussions to take place?

On the issue of the eventual composition of the European Commission, does the Prime Minister agree that the way in which the European Parliament, as the directly elected representative body of all the member states, was able to have an impact on the President of the Commission should encourage one and all of a Eurosceptic disposition or otherwise that it is the proper forum in which proper European parliamentary pressure can be exerted to achieve a healthier, more desirable outcome? Does he also agree that this recent crisis, so-called, in fact redoubles the argument for a smaller Commission—ultimately—of precisely the type that the constitution puts forward?

Finally, on the issue of the constitution and the referendum pertaining to it, the Prime Minister has said that it is the Government's position that there should be a referendum in due course. Will he confirm that the Government, irrespective of what might happen in referendums that may precede one here, will proceed with a referendum, come what may, in this country? If the type of economic liberalism and greater economic flexibility, to which he alluded in his statement and which were discussed at the summit, are achieved, will he perhaps, on a future occasion, see scope for doubling up a referendum on the constitution with one on the single currency?

The Prime Minister: First, in respect of Iraq, let me say that although we had a disagreement about the war, I accept entirely that the questions the right hon. Gentleman is asking are perfectly legitimate ones to ask in this connection. I have made it clear that the Black Watch deployment will be finished so that the Black Watch is back in time for Christmas. It is not anticipated that the Scots Guards will replace the Black Watch in the job that it is doing at the present time.

I also entirely agree that the important thing is to ensure that the democratic elections in Iraq go ahead. As I think we saw with Afghanistan, what happens in the course of the movement towards democracy is that some of those people who were anti-democratic forces end up on the defensive because people can see that there is a democratic process they can take part in. The power of some warlords in Afghanistan was broken not in the two years after the invasion, but in the few months running up to the democratic elections.

The decision in respect of Falluja was taken by the Iraqi Government. It is really important that people understand this. Prime Minister Allawi made it very clear when he was appointed by the United Nations—endorsed by the United Nations—back in June that decisions of this nature were for him. Anyone who heard his press conference today, including his description of exactly how those terrorists and insurgents are using hospitals, schools, mosques and other places to store explosives and to try to ensure that in removing them there is the maximum damage done, could hear from his statement how passionately he believes that this is important. I understand that the decision has also been endorsed by the National Assembly. The very fear that he and others have is that if these terrorists and insurgents are allowed to carry on effectively making no-go areas in Iraq for the Iraqi Government, the issue of elections will be made more difficult.

That brings me to the UN and the Secretary-General's letter. He said in that letter that the Iraqi elections are what he called, I think, the keystone of progress in Iraq. That is true. It is true also that he went on to express reservations about the action in Falluja, but as Prime Minister Allawi says, without the action in Falluja the keystone of the democratic process may be at risk. That is the important reason for doing it.

I think the Secretary-General is right also in saying it is important that we retain the moral high ground in fighting for elections in Iraq, but I say this to him and to others: part of us doing that is to keep emphasising the whole time to people that if the terrorists and insurgents would stop, elections would go forward. There would be full participation by Sunnis and others in those elections. Everyone wants that to happen. If the terrorism and insurgency stopped, there would be no need for American and British and other countries' troops to help the Iraqi forces before they are able to look after Iraq on their own.

The truth of the matter is that it is the terrorism that keeps troops from America, Britain and elsewhere there. If it stopped, of course, the Iraqi Government would be able to assume control of those areas, the UN-sponsored elections would take place and we would have a democratically elected Government. That is why I say to people that the absolutely critical argument to understand is that these terrorists are not fighting foreign troops because of their presence—they are fighting them because they are an obstacle to preventing democratic elections. They know that if democratic elections happen, people will never give up democracy.

In Afghanistan, turnout was highest among women, and highest in the areas where the Taliban used to hold sway. It is obvious from the past few weeks, I am afraid, that the terrorists have an increasingly sophisticated strategy, in relation to how they operate, what they say and how they play the modern media. They are trying to ensure that they focus attention not on their attempt to prevent democracy but on the presence of foreign forces in Iraq, when they know perfectly well that those forces would leave if only the terrorism stopped.

In respect of Iran, the Americans, France, Germany and the UK take the same line: we have all made it clear that it is not acceptable for Iran to acquire nuclear weapons capability. It should come into compliance with the International Atomic Energy Agency. We are trying to put maximum pressure on it to do that. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would endorse that strategy, which we all endorse.

In respect of the European Parliament, I sort of agree with what the right hon. Gentleman says. In respect of a smaller Commission, I entirely agree with what he says—in time, I think that that is important. We have made it clear that we will have a referendum on the EU constitution. As for combining that with one on the euro, we have always made it clear that membership of the single currency must be decided on the basis of the economic tests, and that remains the case.

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): Was it not churlish of the Prime Minister not to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition on his first anniversary as leader, since the right hon. and learned Gentleman will not be around to celebrate a second anniversary?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is out of order. I call Sir Stuart Bell.

Sir Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough) (Lab): I am grateful, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity of answering a question on behalf of the Prime Minister.

However, the Prime Minister, in his statement, referred to our strong relationship with the United States and our strong place in the European Union's Councils. He said that that was Government policy and that it was in our national interest, but were there not siren voices in the Council indicating that competition between the European Union and the United States was a better policy than competition and collaboration? Will he not reiterate that that transatlantic co-operation and closeness to which he referred should also be the policy of the entire European Union?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, I agree with my hon. Friend. In so far as there are any voices saying that Europe should try to set up a rival pole of power to the United States, I think that it is far better that we co-operate strongly together. Of course, that is another reason why it is important for Britain to stay part of the European Union and a key player in Europe. It cannot be stressed too often that many countries around the table in Europe—let us remember that 12 out of the 25 have troops in Iraq—are strong supporters of the transatlantic alliance and need Britain arguing that case with them.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Will the Prime Minister now answer the core argument in the letter of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, which is that an attack on Sunni-held Falluja by mainly Shi'a militia, under cover of American firepower, far from making it more likely that there will be peaceful elections there in January, will prove dangerously divisive for the future social and political unity of Iraq?

The Prime Minister: That is simply not the case. It is not the Sunni-held town of Falluja: the town is held hostage by terrorists and insurgents. If they stopped and laid down their weapons, that town would have its own municipal democratic elections, and the town as a whole could participate in the Iraqi elections. Surely what the hon. Gentleman and every democrat should say is, "There is no need to fight; if you believe in what you are doing, stand in the elections." What Prime Minister Allawi would say to him is that the very purpose of the terrorists, many of whom are not Iraqi, never mind from Falluja, is to stop the democratic process. Surely all of us who are democrats, whatever we think about the war, should agree with the Iraqi Government.

Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): Many of us feel that since the American elections there is an even greater need for very close integration with Europeans on our foreign policy. Was my right hon. Friend able to secure the full backing of European Union partners for our aid and development programme, and particularly our concentration on Africa, for when we hold the presidency—we hope—of both the European Union and the G8 next year?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right to say that aid and development are an important element of our partnership in the European Union. I believe that there is wholehearted support for that, and I also believe that there is support for it in the United States of America. It is important, therefore, for us to use not just the EU presidency but the G8 presidency to further that agenda. As my hon. Friend will know, we have selected climate change and Africa as the two key subjects for our G8 presidency.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): Given widespread concern about the appalling situation in Iraq extending and not being contained, will the Prime Minister and the European Council make it abundantly clear that we are wholly opposed to the bombing or invasion of Iran by America, Israel or anyone else? Will he seek to remind his friend President Bush that it is only a few years since the Americans were supporting, and providing weapons of mass destruction for, their then friend Saddam Hussein so that he could invade Iran?

The Prime Minister: No one is talking about an invasion of Iran. No one has ever talked about it, to my knowledge. I think it is completely absurd of us to talk in this way. However, it is obviously important for Iran to face up to its obligations under the International Atomic Energy Agency. It should also be recognised that our reasons for taking action against Saddam Hussein—going back over 12 or 13 years—were his invasion of Kuwait, his defiance of United Nations resolutions, and the plain intent that he had to develop weapons that cause immense damage not just to the middle east but to the wider world.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is the Prime Minister aware that, now that we have these statements on European summits, no one—with the exception of the leader of the Liberal Democrats—seems to care about the euro or the single currency any more? Are there any long faces when he meets these people? There has been all this talk about our having to join. Seven and a half years have elapsed, and we have kept our promise. I hope everyone understands that. Will the Prime Minister tell them that, at least until the next election, we will not have anything to do with it, and will leave the Liberal Democrats to play with their own little toys?

The Prime Minister: I will not put it exactly like that, but my hon. Friend makes an important point. For years we have been told, particularly by the Conservatives, that our ability to decide whether we want to join the single currency will somehow be taken away by Europe. The fact is that we have that right—we have it absolutely—and we have made it clear that in the end it is a decision for the British people.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): The Prime Minister referred to Wim Kok and his indictment of the way in which Europe has been going. He has also referred to the CBI. He will know that today the president of the CBI issued a similar indictment. He also knows that David Arculus, the head of his own Better Regulation Task Force, has said that this is costing £100 billion a year in over-regulation, much of which emanates from the EU. Does he accept that in the past seven years he and his Government have agreed to a large number of those regulations? Does he also accept that he can therefore do something about it? He can use the powers of this legislative Chamber—this House of Commons—in the interests of British business, which is becoming increasingly angry, to repeal or amend any of the legislation that is having such an impact on British business.

The Prime Minister: Let me make two points. First, I do not think the director-general of the CBI would agree with the hon. Gentleman's views on Europe, whatever he says about European regulation.

Mr. Cash: It was the president.

The Prime Minister: Or indeed the president, for that matter.

Secondly, of course, regulation has been agreed by this Government in the European Union and indeed by the previous Government in the European Union, which I know was not much to the hon. Gentleman's liking either, but it is important to recognise that the only way that we can get Europe to take a better and more sensible view of regulation is to be in there and to be part of it. The alternative is to get out of Europe altogether. I think that he probably would favour that in the end, but it would not be in the interests of British business and British jobs. I do not think that the CBI would opt for that either.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Does not my right hon. Friend agree that the importance of the Lisbon agenda is that, for the first time, it set out benchmarks for economic reform in the EU? The purpose of the Kok report was, rightly, to praise countries such as Britain that have risen to the challenge of economic reform and to criticise others that have failed to do so. It is an opportunity to ensure that those who have not moved forward will do so by the time of the mid-term review next spring and indeed during our presidency.

The Prime Minister: That is absolutely right. It is worth pointing out that it is not simply Britain that has undertaken economic reform but Spain, Denmark, Holland and other countries. A huge reform programme is under way in Germany, tackling really difficult issues. The purpose of the Wim Kok report was to say not that everything in Europe is hopeless but that, on the contrary, there was a certain amount of progress but there needed to be much more.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): As the Prime Minister set out tackling climate change as one of his key international objectives for next year in the G8 and in the EU presidency, can he say what progress was made at the summit on that subject? In particular, can he take the opportunity to defend the reputation of his chief scientific adviser, Sir David King, against the attacks on him last week by the adviser to President Bush on climate change?

The Prime Minister: I am not sure that the person who made the attacks is an adviser to President Bush, still less a member of the US Administration, but obviously I entirely agree with David King's position on climate change. He is absolutely right. We did not discuss it at the European Council, but the European Union would be broadly supportive of that position. It is important that we try to begin a dialogue with the US, very much based on science and technology, as to how to deal with greenhouse gas emissions in the years to come. I hope that we can take forward that agenda.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): If, after another brutal bombardment of Falluja, the Sunni Muslims refuse to participate in the elections, what strategy will the ever decreasing coalition employ to bring democracy and security to Iraq? Will it be bomb a city a month until all that is left in Iraq is rubble and hatred?

The Prime Minister: No, the strategy is very clear: it is to say that, instead of the government of Iraq and Iraqi towns being decided by terrorists who plant car bombs, kill innocent people and kill contractors who are trying to make the country better, there should be a democratic process in which people stand for election both locally and nationally and get elected on the basis of the ballot box. I cannot understand why people cannot agree with that.

In respect of the figure of 100,000 that has been bandied about as the number of people who have died in Iraq over the past period, I saw today, looking at the figures in greater detail, that the figure is extrapolated from the recorded deaths of 61 people. When one sees that, one can understand how much propaganda is coming through on the issue.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): Does the Prime Minister accept that what he has signed up to on immigration is a ratchet mechanism for the one-way transfer of power on making immigration policy away from this country to the supranational authorities in Europe? Can he confirm that, whenever the Government opt in, as he puts it, to immigration measures taken under that procedure, if circumstances subsequently change, or the European Court interprets those measures in ways that we do not anticipate, we will be unable to amend them, or to withdraw from them?

The Prime Minister: The simple position is that we are entitled to decide whether we opt in to any of these measures. That is the pick and choose Europe, if you like, that I thought the right hon. Gentleman and others supported. It is precisely what we are able to do. Indeed, it is more than that: if at the end of the process we decide not to opt in when the measure is first discussed, after that discussion, we can also decide to opt in.

Of course, once we opt in, we are part of that process. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] But it is our complete choice as to whether to opt in; we might as well say that about any measure in Europe. I thought that the whole point was that the Conservative party wanted a situation in which, when measures were discussed, we had the decision whether to opt in or not. This gives us that decision. Obviously, once we opt in, that is presumably because we have decided that it is in our interests to do so. Only the Conservative party could say that a decision whether to opt in is somehow a negation of our sovereignty; surely it is the expression of it.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the best way for people in Scotland, and across the United Kingdom, to show their support for the Black Watch Regiment is by recognising its ability to carry out the task in hand, and the historical importance of that task?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend, who I believe was actually a member of the Black Watch Regiment—

Mr. Joyce indicated assent.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend speaks with a particular authority, and I hope that people will listen to what he said. I am sure that, as someone who used to serve with the Black Watch, his words will command the attention and support of everyone.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): On immigration and asylum, can the Prime Minister confirm the figure extracted from the Home Office in July showing that the United Kingdom has recently agreed to participate in 26 separate measures in that field, including measures defining unauthorised entry, transit and residence, visas, asylum, and the qualification and status of non-EU nationals in seeking entry to this country? Will he confirm that that figure is correct? If it is, does that not show a clear transfer of decision making and authority from this House to the EU, to be decided by majority voting, even if the Government disagree with the eventual decision by that procedure?

The Prime Minister: We decide our own asylum policy here. The Opposition can make many criticisms of the asylum and immigration policy, but the one sure thing is that it has been decided here. However, with some measures we will want to opt in—for example, those to do with illegal immigration, for which it is important that we get European co-operation. Surely the best thing is for it to be the decision of the Government whether to take part. If we decide to take part, we do take part—presumably because we think that that is in our interest. If we decide not to take part, we do not have to take part. It is beyond me why that does not command the support of the Conservative party.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): In the discussions with Dr. Allawi—who, according to the last poll that I saw, represented about 3 per cent. of Iraqi public opinion—was it maintained that the assault on Falluja was being done for the United Nations, as the Prime Minister maintained to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) last week? How can that be so, when the Secretary-General of the United Nations has urged that it should not be undertaken, and said that it would make legitimate elections in Iraq in January less possible?

The Prime Minister: Surely, in the end, as for the decision whether Dr. Allawi commands support in Iraq—all the polling evidence that I have seen shows that he enjoys considerable support there—my hon. Friend may be right, or I may be right. Put it to the test. Let there be elections in Iraq in January, and let the terrorists and insurgents lay down their weapons so that those elections can take place. I would have thought that the best message—even from people such as my hon. Friend, who, for reasons that I entirely respect, was against the war in Iraq—would be to say, "Whatever we thought about the conflict in Iraq, lay down your weapons, let the United Nations-sponsored elections take place, and then let's see who has the support in Iraq."

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): It seems that there was no summit discussion of the worsening crisis in Burma. Given that the military junta there is guilty of savage violations of human rights every day, including using rape as a weapon of war, forced labour, compulsory relocation, use of child soldiers, use of human minesweepers, bestial destruction of villages and the incarceration of 1,400 political prisoners, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is essential that the European Union should adopt not token measures in the form of action against the pineapple juice sector in that country but a robust programme of targeted sanctions against the oil, gas and telecommunications sector, so that we can bring the regime to heel and offer the people of Burma the prospect of the freedom and justice that we have long enjoyed, and they have too long been denied?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman makes a very powerful case. It is important that the European Union adopt stronger action, but to be frank, at the moment it is not possible to get that agreement in Europe. I understand that the matter was discussed at the General Affairs Council, but there is another and bigger issue: how the United Nations changes its charter and its rules, so that the way in which a country treats its own people can be a proper and fitting subject of international discussion. It is not only a question of Burma; there are many other countries in which people live in a state of deep repression, and it is only because of the absence of television cameras that no one notices or protests about it.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): On the middle east, the Palestinian Cabinet Minister Saeb Erekat said to me that the most useful help being given to the Palestinian Authority by any European Government is the British Government's training of the security forces, and he asked me to pass on his thanks. He also said that the Prime Minister, who has the trust of the Palestinian Authority and of the Israeli Government, is in a unique position to take an initiative to revive the middle east peace process. Will he take up that challenge?

The Prime Minister: I thank my right hon. Friend for his comments about those who are engaged in the training of the Palestinian Authority's security forces. Britain has undertaken this work over a significant period, as well as work on political reform and governance. Actually, a lot has been happening underneath the surface that is very important, although not much noticed. As I have said before, I will obviously do everything that I can to ensure that this peace process becomes reinvigorated; plainly, that will be a significant part of the discussions that I have later in the week.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): But further to that question, given the grave ill health of Yasser Arafat, was any consideration given to the possible succession in Palestine? Does the Prime Minister accept that in a way the whole peace process is on a cusp? If the Palestinian organisation falls into the wrong hands, there could be impasse between Israel and Palestine, whereas if the right people succeed Yasser Arafat, the peace process could have a very real future.

The Prime Minister: I agree, which is why it is important to proceed with measures that would allow elections in the Palestinian Authority to take place and the drafting of a new constitution. What is important is that we have empowered Ministers who can take decisions on security issues, but I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the situation is very much in the balance. It is important that we ensure that there is a Palestinian leadership that wants to make progress in the middle east. It is then for the international community to give that moderate Palestinian leadership support.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Is the Prime Minister aware that I utterly condemn, and wish to see countered, terrorism in Iraq not only against the Black Watch but against Iraqi citizens? Four railway workers, all of whom were members of the Iraqi Federation of Trade Unions, were murdered on 27 October between Mosul and Baghdad. What measures have been put in place in Falluja to ensure that such people—innocent people who are held hostage, as the Prime Minister himself put it—are not attacked?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend—he was an opponent of the war, but he has taken a very honourable position on these issues all the way through—is right in saying what the dilemma is. The terrorists are trying to cause maximum difficulty, which is why they are taking over places such as hospitals, schools and mosques. That is the reason why the situation in Falluja has not happened before now. I know from my discussions with Prime Minister Allawi and his Government that over the past few months, they have been making every effort to get a peaceful settlement in Falluja. That included making it clear that, provided that Iraqi Government forces came in and took control in Falluja, there would be no need for multinational forces to be in there, and it included ensuring that it was realised that there would be municipal elections in Falluja. The problem that we now have, however, is that unless we take back control of Falluja, ultimately it will be very difficult for ordinary people there to make progress, but we are doing everything that we can to limit civilian casualties in the course of the action that we take, which is why this is being proceeded with in a very careful way. I entirely agree that the important thing is to ensure that the Iraqi people understand that in the end this is not directed at them, but at the people who are preventing them from getting a democratic outcome.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): I found myself in profound agreement with what the Prime Minister had to say about Iraq and the transatlantic alliance, but the gloss on the summit coming from the Elysée palace is very different, prompting the question whether the Prime Minister and the President of France attended the same European summit.

The Prime Minister: It is probably not the first time that that has been said. Of course there are people in Europe who take a different view of what our attitude should be to the transatlantic alliance, but my answer is that we should remain in there, fighting for the right view of how Europe should co-operate with America, not get out and leave the field to those we disagree with.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Does the Prime Minister agree that there would be security benefits as well as environmental advantages if the west, the European Union, the United States and other Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries reduced their dependence on, and consumption of, oil? What will the EU do over the coming months to try to persuade the second-term US Government to take the problem of global warming more seriously and to reduce US consumption of oil?

The Prime Minister: The emissions trading agreement is obviously an important part of what Europe is trying to do to deal with the problem. Europe as a whole has signed up to the Kyoto protocol. I think that issues connected to security of supply are making people think again, even in the United States of America, albeit from a different perspective. I have made Africa and climate change the key priorities for the G8, so there will be an opportunity to take this agenda forward. It is possible to see how we can do that—probably, when it comes to discussion with the Americans, through the route of science and technology. Long-term issues to do with energy supply, as well as climate change, make that imperative.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Further to that answer, one of the explanations for why our constituents, especially the fuel-poor and large energy-using industries, are threatened with extremely high energy bills this winter is that we have managed to liberalise our energy market quite successfully in the UK, while mainland Europe has dragged its heels. Did the Prime Minister find anything in the summit to encourage any optimism that mainland Europe will eventually address that agenda, open up its own energy markets and decouple the price of gas from oil?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. The Council did discuss the issue of energy liberalisation and why it is important to pursue it. A process of change is now under way, and it will reduce energy prices for our consumers. One of the problems is that we have a liberalised energy market, while other countries in Europe do not, but the movement is definitely towards liberalisation.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): Did the Prime Minister have any discussions with other European Heads of State about the attitudes of countries bordering Iraq? Is there any evidence that any of those countries are providing men and equipment to the rebels in Falluja?

The Prime Minister: A conference taking place in Egypt in the next couple of weeks will discuss that very issue. It is true to say that there are varying reports, but when Dr. Allawi visited Syria recently, he found a willingness to co-operate. I think that it is immensely important for both Syria and Iran in particular to ensure that their borders are not being used as a route for people to cross over and engage in terrorist activity. We are certainly making it very clear to those countries that any such support of terrorism in Iraq is unacceptable. I believe that the conference will play some part in flushing out people's positions and will send out a strong signal that those who support terrorists and insurgents are in breach of their moral obligations to the international community.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): The surrender of Britain's veto on asylum and immigration policy in favour of qualified majority voting forms part of the European constitution. That being the case, why is the Prime Minister taking the decision to give up the veto now? Can he not wait for the referendum, when the British people will be able to vote on the constitution?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman said, "That being the case", but it is not the case. We are not giving up the absolute right to decide whether to opt in to any asylum or immigration measure, and that is very sensible. There are certain issues—for example, as I said a moment ago, people trafficking and illegal immigration—on which we want to be part of European action. However, we can decide those issues one by one. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary rightly said, it is the best of both worlds.

The hon. Gentleman probably represents the mainstream view in the Conservative party today. It is not really about opting in or opting out, or this veto or that veto. What he and his colleagues want is a fundamental restructuring of Britain's existing relationship with the European Union—[Interruption.] Well, one or two Opposition Members shake their heads and many of them nod. Why do they not sort it out between themselves and come back with a proper position?

Regional Referendums

4.30 pm

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott) rose—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hooray!"] Here today, gone tomorrow.

With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to report to the House on the regional referendum in the north-east, held last Thursday. May I first congratulate Ged Fitzgerald, the chief counting officer, and his staff across the north-east, who ran such a well-organised poll and count? I also want to thank the police, the Post Office and the Electoral Commission for their co-operation during the referendum.

Turnout, at nearly 48 per cent., was a great deal more than many people expected and has shown that all-postal voting can be extremely successful when the ground is well prepared. This ballot was conducted successfully, without witness statements, and the turnout has increased considerably. It was higher than the 42 per cent. turnout in the European elections in the north-east, higher than the 34 per cent. in the London referendum and similar to the 50 per cent. in the Welsh referendum. I am sure that the Electoral Commission will want to reflect on that.

Throughout the referendum, the Government have made it absolutely clear that the decision whether to have elected regional government rests with the people. It is their choice and their say. Our policy of devolution, set out in our manifesto, means giving power to people in our nations and regions so that they can set their own priorities and make more decisions that affect their lives. As a result, London now has city-wide government and a Mayor powerful enough to run a global city. The Scottish Parliament enables the people of Scotland to make key decisions without recourse to Westminster for the first time in hundreds of years. The Welsh Assembly has given the Welsh people a powerful new voice to create jobs, prosperity, and social justice. Each of these new bodies was voted for by the people and has since proved to be very popular.

It is worth remembering that proposals for Scottish and Welsh devolution failed to win public support in the first referendum in 1979, only for the situation to be reversed 20 years later in a new referendum. On 4 November, we offered the people of the north-east the chance to benefit from an elected regional assembly. Last Thursday, voters in the north-east decided by a margin of 78 per cent. to 22 per cent. that they did not want that, and of course we abide by their decision.

I confirm to the House that the result of the referendum means that the Regional Assemblies Bill will not be introduced in the coming Session of Parliament; under existing legislation, there can be no further referendum on regional assemblies in the north-east for at least seven years; and—let me make it clear—despite press speculation, there will be no reorganisation of local government in County Durham or Northumberland arising out of this referendum result. Indeed, I hope that the two councils can now get on with delivering effective services for their people.

The decision now raises the question as to whether to proceed, as we previously intended, with referendums in the north-west and in Yorkshire and the Humber. We have reflected on the outcome of the referendum in the north-east, as promised. We have also made it clear that referendums in the north-west and in Yorkshire and the Humber would have to wait until the Electoral Commission had completed its work on the "new foundation model for voting." That is not due to be published until the end of March 2005.

The Electoral Commission has also said that there should be no electoral pilots using the new model until at least September 2005, but in the meantime, under the legislation, our ability to hold referendums based on the current soundings exercise runs out in June 2005. We would, therefore, need to conduct a new soundings exercise and bring orders to call the referendums before both Houses of Parliament under the Regional Assemblies (Preparations) Act 2003. All that would result in a long period of uncertainty for local government in the two regions, and we do not think that is acceptable. I will not, therefore, be bringing forward orders for referendums in either the north-west or Yorkshire and the Humber. If and when, in the future, a region wants to move ahead with a referendum, the House will have plenty of notice of that event.

I do not want to underplay the importance of last week's decision, but the House should remember that elected regional assemblies are just one part of the wider programme of devolution and decentralisation in England. For a decade or more, it has been recognised that there are issues that must be dealt with at regional, rather than national, level, but which need to be co-ordinated over an area larger than any single local authority—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Members should look at a map if they are in any doubt.

That is why the Conservatives established the Government offices for the regions in 1994, and rightly so. We have since strengthened the Government offices to include more departments. We also created, in 1998, the regional development agencies as economic powerhouses for their regions; the Conservatives opposed them, but I believe that they have now changed their minds.

In the last two years alone, the English RDAs have created or safeguarded more than 160,000 jobs and have played a major part in reshaping our regional economies. The House will be aware that in 1998 every English region was given the choice of having a voluntary regional assembly composed of representatives from local government, business, trade unions and the wider community. All eight regions—all of them—chose to have one of those voluntary regional assemblies. All parties are represented on them, and some are even chaired by Conservative councillors.

Those voluntary assemblies have an important influence on housing, planning, transport, economic development and skills and training in their region. Those regional bodies play a co-ordinating, strategic role with the full involvement of local authorities and other representatives in the regions. The successful northern way initiative, launched in February this year, is a good example of the benefits of that co-operative approach.

The RDAs and their partners in the three northern regions are working together to create more jobs, more prosperity and greater justice. The northern way has been warmly received, and has energised people in the three northern regions—that includes representatives of all political parties. It is one example of how, across the country, regional structures and initiatives will continue to work for the benefit of the regions with the full support of the Government.

Our continuing agenda of reform and devolution to local authorities is equally important. That was evident in July, when we launched our document, "Local Vision", beginning an extensive consultation about the future of local government. It means allowing more decisions to be made in local communities. Along with the modernisation and reform of local government, we have taken several steps to devolve decision making to local authorities. We have removed the restrictive controls on local authority borrowing. We have given local authorities greater power to promote the well-being of their communities and the freedoms and flexibilities to deliver better services, and we are piloting local area agreements that will streamline funding from Whitehall so that spending can better reflect local priorities, determined locally. All those measures—every one of them—have been warmly welcomed by all local authorities.

Our agenda for reform, change and modernisation means that we will continue to decentralise and devolve power wherever we can. We have already done a lot, and there is a lot more to do. We have already brought economic stability, lower unemployment and lower inflation; and our commitment to delivering the best possible future for all the regions remains as strong as ever.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): I commend the right hon. Gentleman for coming to the House and making a statement at the first opportunity, and I associate the official Opposition with his thanks to the returning officer and his staff.

Will the Electoral Commission carry out a full evaluation of the referendum? The right hon. Gentleman is on record as having expressed surprise at the scale of the defeat, but how can the result have come as such a surprise? Was he not listening when the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), said:

> "We will lose because we have failed to get across a coherent message."?

He should know; after all, 90 per cent. of Darlington's voters said no to a regional assembly, the highest proportion in the north-east. People understood, loud and clear, that the assembly would not put one more doctor, teacher, nurse or policeman into service.

As for the Liberal Democrats, they were not surprised by the defeat. No sooner was it clear that they were on the losing side than they withdrew their support for the Bill. They might as well have the slogan, "Never knowingly missing a bandwagon".

It is quite clear that the decisive "No" vote in the north-east has serious consequences for the Government's entire regional agenda. Will the right hon. Gentleman stick to the promise that he made to the people of the north-east on 19 October, when he said:

> "If you don't want it, we drop it"?

What exactly did his long statement mean? Will he now say, loud and clear, that the regional agenda is dead? In broader terms, what does this humiliating defeat mean for the Government's whole regional agenda?

What of the powers that have been stripped from local authorities and handed over to expensive, unelected regional chambers? The right hon. Gentleman criticised our participation in regional chambers, but our participation simply reflects the fact that core powers have been stolen from local government. He talks of a choice for the regions to have unelected regional assemblies. That is Hobson's choice. Given that the regional chambers now have no prospect of any democratic mandate, will the right hon. Gentleman abolish them? Will he return the crucial powers of housing, planning fire and rescue services to democratically elected local councils? Why not fill the vacancy in the Queen's Speech where a regional assemblies Bill would otherwise have appeared with a Bill to return the powers that have been stripped from local authorities? Or does he share the view of the Secretary of State for Education and Skills in seeing > "councils as agents of central Government"?

This is an urgent question; it cannot be fudged or kicked into touch. People up and down the land are living under the threat of huge house-building targets proposed by unelected regional housing boards. Is the right hon. Gentleman not duty bound to get rid of those housing boards as well? [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The House listened to the Deputy Prime Minister with politeness; those on the Government Front Bench should do the same for the hon. Member who is speaking for the Opposition.

Mrs. Spelman: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

What about the cost of this whole sorry saga? The Government have ploughed tens of millions of pounds into the campaign for a regional assembly that only 20 per cent. of voters wanted. The whole exercise has been humiliating for the Government and expensive for the taxpayer. Is the right hon. Gentleman really serious about more soundings, throwing more money after bad? I am not going to ask him to resign because he will not, but the nation is owed an apology for the tens of millions of pounds wasted in pursuit of a pipedream that is very definitely history now—and, if the House is honest, so is he.

The Deputy Prime Minister: They must be joking.

I thank the hon. Lady for her kind remarks at the beginning of her contribution, which I appreciated, and I can answer some of her questions. It is proper to ask about the Electoral Commission. I think that it has made a statement and there should be an analysis of the postal ballot. The all-postal ballot was very successful, without any talk of witnesses' statements or any problems whatsoever—that should make the Electoral Commission think about things. The commission will analyse the result and publish a report in—I think—the summer.

On people's choice, I shall never apologise for giving people the opportunity to say whether they agree with something on occasions other than the general election—I thought that the Conservative party was demanding referendums on the European constitution and the euro to give people choice. But referendums cost money. People need to be provided with information and leaflets so that they may make proper decisions, but that costs money, albeit not the tens of millions that the hon. Lady was talking about. The actual cost of running the referendum was £2.9 million—[Interruption.] I am just saying that if hon. Members look at the cost per capita of the referendums in London, Scotland and Wales, they will see that the recent referendum was cheaper. I must admit that the cost is a reality, but the alternative would be to do what the Conservative Government did. They abolished 18 councils and the Greater London council without any consideration whatsoever. They held no referendums, and the people eventually had to demand the right for a local authority. I will take no lectures from the Tories about abolishing local authorities.

The hon. Lady put forward the argument that the assembly would have created not one teacher, nurse or doctor more, but that was never the intention—that was never in the White Paper. This Government have produced thousands upon thousands of doctors, teachers and nurses, but that was not the intended role of the assembly, although it does relate to one of the arguments that was put forward during the campaign.

At the end of the day, we must consider the effect on the regional agenda. I said in my statement that I believe there is still a strong argument for a regional dimension, otherwise things will be left to unelected quangos and civil servants.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): Scrap them.

The Deputy Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman shouts, "Scrap them", but he was a member of the Government who set them up. The regional government civil servants were set up in 1994 for one good reason: decisions had to be taken on a regional basis, so the Conservatives set up the regional Government offices. We came along and established the regional development agencies, but the hon. Lady did not say whether the Conservatives are for or against them. Although the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) says that they have not said that they are against the RDAs, their manifesto made it clear that they would abolish them. They say that they have had a change of heart, so perhaps she will tell us whether they will get rid of the RDAs.

We will keep regional Government offices and regional development agencies, and as for the regional assemblies, we will keep them also. They are not as good as assemblies with directly elected members, but people are directly appointed to them. Elected councillors serve on them, so they can make decisions about regional priorities instead of the unelected members of quangos. I think that that is right. That dimension will continue and we will support it, working with local government.

If the Tories are against regional assemblies, it would be useful to hear why they do not tell all their councillors to resign from them—they joined them voluntarily. If the Tories do not want them, they can get off them. If they want to be honest, that is what they should do. We will keep the regional assemblies, the regional development agencies and regional government. The regional dimension will form an essential part of this Government's policy to correct the economic differential between the north and south of this country. Let us be clear that that is our intention.

I was a bit surprised that the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) was asking the questions, because we were all waiting for the big man to come in—the hon. Member for North Essex. He was the guy who said that if turnout in the vote got anywhere near 50 per cent., he would eat his hat. I believe that he has eaten it already, so on that he was wrong—just like everything else that the hon. Lady said.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for his statement and agree about the professionalism of the officials and police during the process. He knows that Liberal Democrats share his disappointment at the outcome of the referendum, but equally believe that all democrats need to respect the voice of the people, especially when it is spoken so clearly.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister worried that with elected regional assemblies off the immediate political agenda, a growing democratic deficit remains in our regions which needs to be tackled in another way? There are quangos that he inherited from the Conservatives, as he told the House, and quangos that Labour Governments have created and they need to feel the heat of greater accountability. Will he therefore revisit his decision to force through the House and the other place, against Liberal Democrat and Conservative opposition, the taking of strategic planning powers away from county councils? Is not planning one example of powers that can quickly be handed down and given back to local government? Will he set up a cross-departmental review of all elements of Britain's regional bureaucracy to consider how democratic accountability and efficiency can be improved in the absence of directly elected assemblies, especially through stronger local democratic input?

The Deputy Prime Minister knows that from the White Paper on, the Liberal Democrats felt that the regional devolution he was offering was too weak and the package of local government reorganisation too confusing to ensure that the "Yes" vote was maximised. Given that he has come to the House so quickly to discuss the defeat and to tell the House his position, will he at least admit that the Government were wrong on powers and wrong on the linkage with local government reorganisation?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's comments in support of the people who were involved in running the ballot. I am also grateful that he took part in the debate and for the statement and visit by the leader of the Liberal Democrats, the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy), in support of the regional assembly. I am bound to say, however, that I did not find many more Liberals beyond them who were in favour of it. The others on the ground melted away, so there was no great Liberal support. [Interruption.] Well, in the last week of the election you made the statement that you would kill the Bill—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Deputy Prime Minister must be careful to use the correct parliamentary language.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I must get my procedure right.

In the last week of the election, the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) made the front-page statement:

"We will kill the Bill".

Quite frankly, that is the kind of support I could do without. I had the feeling that the Liberals were with us one moment and against us the next. It is the Liberal flip-flop in British politics, and I should have got used to it by now.

The hon. Gentleman talked about quangos established by us. That is true: the regional development agency is a quango. When I introduced the idea of regional development to the House, I said that we had not yet introduced democratic accountability. That was the purpose of the assembly: to have an elected assembly that subjected those quangos to that accountability.

As for whether there are sufficient powers, those arguments will go on. There has to be an agreement in government about the distribution of powers from Whitehall to the regions. That is inevitable. I gave the best negotiated position that I thought was sufficient. I note that Mayor Livingstone of London came to the area and said that he wished that he had the same powers that we were proposing for the north-east. I just comment on that, him being the mayor of Livingston—I mean Mayor of London.

We will analyse what caused the emphatic defeat, and it was an emphatic defeat, of the idea of a directly elected assembly. Not many Conservatives campaigned against it, however. They were all kept down here, their mouths quiet, and were never involved in the election. I must make it clear that the defeat was not the result of one thing. If one issue did run through the campaign, however, it was that the people felt that it would mean more politicians. I was constantly challenged about that. In fact, there would have been 500 fewer because of the abolition of the councils.

Mr. Pickles: They did not believe you.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am just giving the facts. The people decided that they did not like the idea of more politicians. Perhaps the council tax played its part in that, even though it would have meant a £12 million saving, with 10 more councils abolished. [Interruption.] I accept their decision, but I can have a different view. That is why I introduced the Bill. However, the people have spoken and I am now reacting to that. I accept their decision and I am reporting it to Parliament.

Sir Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough) (Lab): The House will welcome the statement by the Deputy Prime Minister that there will be a continuing agenda of reform and devolution for local government. He referred to powers that we have given back to local authorities to promote the well-being of their communities. Does he recall his visit to Middlesbrough with the Prime Minister, when he saw a community in action at a community council, where the people told him that those powers had given power back to the people, and that their community had been enormously improved as a result? Will he reiterate that there will be a continuing decentralisation and devolution of those powers to local communities so that they can all benefit from the actions of a Labour Government?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I certainly can. I well remember my visit and the meeting that I chaired with my hon. Friend, where there was great support for the proposal. The reality is that the decision was still 8:2 against us and, whether I like it or not, I must face up to that. However, I can assure him that decentralisation and reform of local government will continue. The democratic point, albeit important, was only one part of modernisation and reform. I do not know—eventually, people may come round to accepting that unelected individuals should not make decisions for them, and decide that they want elected individuals. However, the people have spoken in the north-east, and at this stage they do not want a regional assembly. If politicians are to be worth anything they must take that into account.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): Will the Deputy Prime Minister give the people of the north-east the hearty congratulations of their neighbours in North Yorkshire, who would have voted no in equal or even greater proportions if the referendum there had gone ahead? Does he accept that one reason for the public rejection of those ideas is that, except where whole tiers of government have been abolished without replacement, people's experience of local government reorganisation under successive Governments is one of vast expenditure with very few benefits to show afterwards? Could he not do a great deal for long-term respect for local democracy and civic pride in local institutions, as well as enable councils to get on with the job in the way that he described earlier, by declaring the whole era of local government reorganisation to be well and truly over?

The Deputy Prime Minister: No, I do not accept that for one moment. It was under the previous Administration, who abolished 18 councils, that costs became really extraordinary. Most people who speak about the evidence of reorganisation of local government refer to the way in which it was done under a past Administration, when 18 councils were abolished without any consideration. I therefore do not accept that we have reached an ideal stage in local government. We stand for unitary authorities, as the right hon. Gentleman knows. [Interruption.] Well, it is our policy and we believe in unitary authorities. Curiously, the Tories in England say that they do not like unitary authorities—they want to keep the counties—so why did they force them on Scotland without any consultation whatsoever or even leaving the issue to be decided by the Scottish Parliament or an assembly? As for the right hon. Gentleman's point that the vote would be bigger in Yorkshire, I do not know whether that would be the case. However, in the Welsh referendum in 1979, there was an even bigger defeat for people who wanted devolution. Twenty years later, however, they came back and voted for it when they realised its full benefit.

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): May I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for his statement? Returning to the issue of scrutiny that should be afforded Parliament, the Regional Affairs Committee meets very infrequently. Does he foresee the possibility of looking at arrangements for that Committee, and perhaps extending them to allow Select Committee-type powers for areas such as Yorkshire and the Humber, the north-east, the north-west and other English regions to make sure that Parliament scrutinises those regional bodies?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I understand the point that my hon. Friend is making. I have been a Member of Parliament for over 30 years, although some people want me to go now, and have witnessed demands in the House and the Chamber to set up various regional committees. I have always supported those demands, but the House does not have a very good record of providing much influence or power to Members, and we are told that there is no time for debate. The last regional debate was on the northern way, when one Tory turned up. Despite demands for Parliament to deal with regional affairs, the evidence, I am afraid, is against such a role. I am supportive of my hon. Friend, but the pressure of time on this legislature is one reason why people in the regions should make their own decisions. We have neither the time nor frankly the inclination to debate regional matters in the Chamber.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that one of the unbridgeable problems in the referendum was the colossal gap between the rhetoric that was used to describe the proposed devolution and the powers that would have accompanied it? Was not that because the Government—least of all the Deputy Prime Minister and the Prime Minister—never made up their mind on what powers they wanted to devolve, so the Deputy Prime Minister spent the last few days of the campaign scratching around for any powers that he could beg, borrow or steal to make the proposals look substantial? Is not the lesson that, with future policies, the Government as a whole need to make up their mind on what they want and to concede to people substance, not shadows?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The House recognises that the right hon. Gentleman is a fair man in his appraisal of these matters and knows a great deal about local authority and regional issues. In fact, he was one of the few Conservatives to say that, if the assembly had more powers, he would vote for it. That was certainly his position, if not that of his Front Benchers. The powers were clearly set out in the White Paper and the question whether they were enough was constantly debated in the House. We went further than the White Paper on fire, planning arrangements and transport. Some might argue that the assembly should be a parliament with the powers that we have. That is fair enough. We tried to strike a balance between local authorities, Whitehall and Westminster, and that is what we tried to explain to people. However, the question of powers was not the main issue. To be honest, people were mostly concerned about whether they wanted another layer of the decision-making process. The question that constantly came up was, "Does this mean that there will be another tier, that we are going to pay for it and that there will be more politicians?" It did not matter that I could show that that was not so, because they had reached their conclusion and that was it—they thought that it would be a white elephant.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): I congratulate the Deputy Prime Minister on his work on this over the years. His quest to extend democracy is an honourable one, and he should be congratulated on it.

Is my right hon. Friend aware that, as recently as this morning, constituents have contacted me to ask for more democratic control of local services privatised by the Conservatives? Is not there still a case for extending democracy to the regions and localities, and can we look for other ways of doing that?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind personal remarks. I noted that, immediately after the result was announced, even the no campaign was saying, "We still need to find ways to deal with this issue", and that has continued. I have even heard voices calling for national conventions, which is precisely what happened in Scotland and Wales. I do not support that, but I would sooner hear what people have to say about it. The no campaigners have started to wonder whether they have missed an opportunity. They voted against it, but now they are saying, "Can we have something, albeit different, after all?" I have to ask whether they are whistling in the wind.

We will continue to reform the local government structure. We will devolve more powers downwards by strengthening regional development agencies, regional government and assemblies. For the moment, that will have to be the way forward for the north-east.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): I am grateful to the Deputy Prime Minister for his statement. Does not he realise that his refusal to rule out completely a referendum in Yorkshire and Humber and his response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) on unitary authorities will only prolong the uncertainty as regards local government in North Yorkshire? Most people in North Yorkshire—a county that is almost 100 miles wide—think that they already have regional government through North Yorkshire county council. Will the Deputy Prime Minister get on with the job of devolving powers back to it so that, as my right hon. Friend said, we can get good people elected into the council chamber and get some decisions made locally?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I thought that I had made it clear to the House that changes to the local government structure of, in this case, Northumberland and Durham would fall if the people said no, which is what they clearly did. I made it clear that no changes to the local government structure would arise out of the assembly. Our manifesto stated our belief in establishing unitary local government, but that would require primary legislation.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): Wrong—ask the Minister for Local and Regional Government.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am only passing on the advice that I receive. I do not necessarily agree with the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway). Basically, local government reorganisation would need to go through a proper process. As that is not being proposed, the local government structure that we have at the moment is not affected whatsoever by this decision. Local government as it is, in its county, district and unitary form, will continue.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend on behalf of the north-east of England for at least giving us a vote. If the Tories had been in power, we would not have got one. People are basically saying that they want more democracy in their areas and their councillors to be more professional but, unfortunately, we lost the vote. We should have some sort of organisation, even if it has to be in Parliament, to tie the north-east together, join the threads and get moving because we are being left behind by the Welsh, the Scots and Londoners.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's words. I read some of the reports on Friday and Saturday after the results and I have heard the comments that we should do something. I presented one proposal, which the people in the north-east emphatically turned down. I can therefore only say that we shall continue to see what we can do to strengthen the assembly, RDAs and local government generally. Giving people more power to make decisions means devolving some of the decisions from local government to communities. We are doing that; it is embodied in the local vision and we shall continue with the reforms because we want to decentralise decision making.

I am sorry about the decision that the people in the north-east made, but it is their decision and it is our job to recognise that. However, I reassure myself by remembering that a successful conclusion was ultimately reached in Wales and Scotland.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that his proposal for directly elected regional assemblies was at least a partial answer to the West Lothian question. Given that it has failed, will he consider preventing Members who represent Scottish constituencies from voting on exclusively English business?

The Deputy Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his decision not to press ahead with a referendum in the north-west of England, which would certainly have been lost. Was the referendum in the north-east lost during or before the campaign?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am used to clever questions from my hon. Friend. It is time to worry when we get support from him. I do not know why the referendum was lost—there is a range of reasons. I have probably spent more time than anyone else defending the proposal and listening to people's views in markets, streets and in debates. I gave some of the reasons, which included worries about too many politicians and cost. Europe was mentioned from time to time, as if the proposal were a Euro-plot. All those factors played a part. I do not think that there was one major reason. I cannot therefore really give an answer to the question "Why?". All I need to know now is that I did not convince people and that I was emphatically defeated. I have had to take the consequences today. As to the north-west, we must wait and see.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for his statement and share his disappointment. He may know that the Northwest Development Agency held a meeting last Friday as a briefing for Members of Parliament. Several Labour Members attended, as I did. The development agency was clear that some untidy ends remain in the north-west. The links between the agency, the Government office for the north-west and the Learning and Skills Council are not as strong as they should be and accountability remains poor and divided. Will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that he will take those issues forward and improve the accountability of those big budget quangos?

The Deputy Prime Minister: That is an important question, which I had to address during the debate. We produced a White Paper that reflected the judgment between Whitehall and us about the powers that could be redistributed. Some were already undergoing a form of reorganisation. The Learning and Skills Council was a classic example of something that was established both nationally and locally. As I said earlier, people found in the regions that regional directors had to be appointed to make regional decisions about training. I argued after the White Paper that people in the regions should make the decisions. Local bodies alone cannot do that; there needs to be regional decision making. That has been recognised by the Learning and Skills Council, and the fact that we approved the number of people to be appointed by the assembly to sit on the board responsible for training is an improvement. This is also a recognition that regional dimension decision making is going to be there all the time, whether it involves elected people or unelected people.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): I understand why we cannot go ahead with the referendum in the north-west, but it is very disappointing. I urge my right hon. Friend not to lose sight of the fact that, while there has been a reversal in the north-east, the case for regional devolution and accountability has not been lost. There is still a very strong case for it, because too many strategic decisions are still being taken by unelected and unaccountable people. I hope that he will address that issue. In the case of local government in Lancashire, does he recognise that the changes brought in under the Banham review by the Conservative Government were a poor, hybrid solution that introduced two unitary authorities and left the rest of the county with two-tier local government? That also needs to be addressed.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend's last comment. In regard to regional devolution, the thing that has always convinced me of the need to do more than simply leave things to central Government is the increasing differential between the north and the south. It has now been measured that if the three northern regions were to secure the same level of growth in gross domestic product that there is in the south, they would be £30 billion better off and there would be 250,000 more jobs. That is the reality. While all the regions have now increased their prosperity under the Labour Government and reduced their unemployment by half, the differential still exists. That is why I feel strongly that we need to do something more.

The institutional changes in London, Wales and Scotland have made a difference and I tried to argue the case for such changes in the north-east. I certainly recognise that that argument is also true for the north-west, but it will be up to the people of the north-west to make their views clear. We have kept the legislation relating to these measures, and if it is their declared opinion that they want one, the legislation remains for another exercise, but not within the next year or so.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): Many Members on both sides of the House have been telling the Deputy Prime Minister for months that the soundings exercise was incompetently handled. Does he now accept that he completely mishandled that process and completely misread public opinion through the soundings exercise?

The Deputy Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that, while this particular proposal might be dead, the principle of devolution most certainly is not. We on this side of the Chamber need take no lectures from the Conservatives on devolution, because when they last occupied the Government Benches, they were the most centralising Government this country had ever seen. When the dust has settled, will my right hon. Friend consider introducing either a White or Green Paper to examine a new constitutional settlement for this country, based on the principle of devolution, to address the regional democratic deficit and to examine the transfer of significantly more powers to local government, including the right to regulate local public transport?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Of course, those were some of the powers that we were considering that the assemblies should have, particularly on a regional basis. I know that my hon. Friend was a little critical of our proposals, but he now wants to renegotiate and discuss them. Fine. I hope that the debate will continue, but I think that the opportunity has been lost. That argument has taken place in the north-east, to a certain extent, although in my view this will still come, in the north-east as well as in Yorkshire and Humberside. In the meantime, however, my hon. Friend is right to say that we should now ensure that our local government structure delivers in the best way. The councillors who sit on local authorities already sit in the regional assemblies so, although they are not directly elected to them, they are indirectly elected. That will give them some authority, as opposed to the quangos and civil servants in regional government who make the decisions at the moment.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): The decision not to proceed with the referendum in the north-west is very welcome and is, in part, a tribute to the North West Says No campaign, which was enthusiastically supported by many Labour MPs. The Deputy Prime Minister has ruled out a referendum in the north-east for seven years. Is he also ruling out a referendum in the north-west for seven years?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The ruling out comes from the statutory obligation that the House imposed on us, but that does not apply to the north-west or to Yorkshire and Humberside, because they have not had referendums. Had they done so, and said no, it could apply. It is therefore possible that if a particular view was developed and assessments were made in the north-west and Yorkshire and Humberside, they could still have a referendum. The legislation is there for them to do so if they so wish.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): May I say to the right hon. Gentleman, in the most friendly way, that he will wait a darn sight longer than 20 years to get a yes vote out of Devon and Cornwall? He is into hell freezing over territory there. If he is not going to abolish those unelected bodies that are spending money on our behalf, will he please have a referendum in the south-west? I promise him that he will have good news at that Dispatch Box about the turnout—it will be really high.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I fear that the hon. Lady might be eating her hat as well. She puts Cornwall and Devon together, but if the vote on the decision were held solely in Cornwall, I wonder whether she would be so confident about the result.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): In Wokingham we have a unitary council, thanks to the previous Government, and we would like that council to make the crucial housing and planning decisions that affect our lives. Now that the Deputy Prime Minister has shown that even he cannot push the vote out for elected regional government, will he get rid of the unelected junta in Guildford and give the powers over planning and housing to my local elected councillors, who would do a good job with them?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman makes a point about the unelected junta, but it is staffed by many Tories, I understand. Out of 100, 44 Conservatives sit on it. I just make the point that they seem to be actively participating—[Interruption.] There are 44 Tories sitting on it, right? All I am saying is that if the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) looks at the decisions on these regional matters of housing and planning—all of them have a regional dimension—he will see that the local authorities, whether unitary or county, are not sufficiently wide to take the regional dimension into account. That is why the Government set up the regional offices to deal with these matters and to find a regional decision. They were right on that and we are right to add democratic accountability to it. I look forward with interest to see how many Tories are going to resign from these assemblies.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): Will the Deputy Prime Minister promise to take seriously the implications of what may be unexpected, but is a substantial and clear expression of opinion by the people? Is he in particular willing to give the people of Scotland and Wales the opportunity to have another referendum to ask whether they wish to retain their devolved Administrations, bearing it in mind that I gained a clear impression from my visits there that people are fed up to the teeth with the cost and bureaucracy of those organisations? Is he willing to give the people of Scotland and Wales a chance to say whether they wish to keep their devolved government?

The Deputy Prime Minister: That matter is something that the people of Scotland and Wales have the choice to develop themselves, if they wish. I note that when devolution was opposed by the Tories, that effectively destroyed the Tory party in Scotland.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Following this excellent expression of common sense by the people of the north-east, and indeed the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor), will the Deputy Prime Minister consider giving the people of London a further referendum so that they can express their view on whether they think that this outrageously expensive assembly and Mayor are worth the money spent on them or whether it is time to lay them quietly to rest?

The Deputy Prime Minister: What an absolute cheek from somebody who supported the abolition of the Greater London council with no consideration whatever for the people and now advocates a referendum. Is not the cost a consideration? Is not the democratic mandate? It is hypocrisy we expect from those on the Tory Benches and we get it.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): The Deputy Prime Minister will know that many provisions in a number of recent Government Bills have transferred powers of one sort or another upwards to the regional authorities. There was the expectation or hope—the word can be chosen—that directly elected regional assemblies would be a reality, but now that it is apparent that they will not be a reality for some time, will he, where possible, consider those recently enacted measures and not activate those provisions, which would take power from directly elected local authorities of one sort or another and give it to unelected regional authorities?

The Deputy Prime Minister: First, I am not readily accepting, because there has been one decision in the north-east, that we will not move towards a regional dimension, and eventually an elected one.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman can.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have accepted the decision and I am giving my judgment. I am entitled to do that; I am still a person with a political view. I am not giving up what I have believed for 30 years, which will eventually come about, as it did in Wales and Scotland.

With regard to the point about powers being taken away from local authorities and some going to the regions, whether they are on planning and the regional dimension, housing, transport or the fire and emergency services, where it is felt that the local authority boundaries are not sufficient to deal with the region-wide considerations, there are regional decisions for which the local authority boundaries are inadequate. I have to say, because the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir Sydney Chapman) was a member of the Government who did it, that the regional government civil servants and the Government offices were set up to deal with that problem because of the inadequacy of the boundaries and powers of local authorities.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): Does the Deputy Prime Minister realise that, if a referendum were held in the east of England in general, and Hertfordshire in particular, it would be defeated not by 4:1 but by 40:1? Does he realise that that is because people resent the transfer of power that has already taken place from local authorities to a more remote and distant regional authority and the efforts by that authority to impose housing targets on Hertfordshire that are wholly unwelcome to its residents? Previously, when Hertfordshire had the opportunity to take such decisions, and a Lib-Lab county council tried to impose building on the green belt, we were able to defeat it at the ballot box and change the policy. We want those powers back at county level, so that we can determine our own future.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I do not know whether the proposal would be defeated by 40:1 in the east of England—[Interruption.] Even if it were 50:1, the right hon. Gentleman is showing his arrogance by feeling that he knows what the outcome would be. What we have done is to put the question to the people and let them make the decision. There is an important difference between those two positions. I may give my judgment to the region, but it may reject it, as it has done on this occasion. I am not therefore acting on my judgment, as, to its mind, my judgment was wrong. I will not assume that I know what the outcome will be in the eastern region, but the assembly there has 36 Tories on it, is chaired by a Tory, and is considering the housing situation and recommendations on it. We are in discussion with it, but I notice that it and the Government differ by only a few thousand on what housing is needed in the area. We will continue the discussion.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): A few moments ago, the Deputy Prime Minister said that he did not understand why he lost the referendum in the north-east. The reason is blindingly obvious. He lost the referendum in the north-east, as he would everywhere else in the country, because the people of this country do not want regional assemblies. That being so, he went on to say that he has learned the lesson and that he accepts the result. But he does not, because he said that regional assemblies will continue. The South East England regional assembly is not only unelected but unloved and unwanted. Why should the people of Kent pay for a quango for which they have not voted and that they do not want?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Again, I do not know how the hon. Gentleman can assume what will happen in other areas. We must wait and see. As for my accepting the judgment of the north-east, I have done so. I asked it not about the regional assembly but about an elected regional assembly. It chose to vote against it, and I have announced to Parliament today that I have no intention of bringing forward the Bill that would make such an assembly a reality, because the people have spoken. In those circumstances, the unelected regional assemblies, rather than unelected quangos, need to make decisions about matters that affect their regions, as at least they are indirectly elected—again, I suspect that in the south-east, the assembly will have more Tories than Labour members. I think that that is right. We will fully support the assemblies, we will get on with it and I wait to see how many Tories will resign from them.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): Referring to the deferred referendums, the Deputy Prime Minister said that, if in future a region does not want to move ahead with a referendum, the House will have plenty of notice of that. How will he ascertain whether a region wants to move ahead with a referendum and what criteria will he use?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The Regional Assemblies (Preparations) Act 2003 lays down how to consult and report back. I did that for the north-east, Yorkshire and Humber, the north-west and all the regions. Those were the only three regions in the north, on consultation, in which more than 50 per cent. wanted to have a referendum as to whether to have an elected assembly. That is laid out in the Act, and if the consultation process is to happen again, that remains what will take place and be reported to Parliament.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): Will the Government genuinely learn the lessons rather than give up? Will they let the people genuinely decide in which regions to hold referendums, on which powers from the menu, when to hold them and on whose terms? I agree with the Deputy Prime Minister that the Government would have won a referendum in Cornwall, but when will we get that referendum?

The Deputy Prime Minister: First, I am not giving up, and I hope that I do not give that impression. I am being attacked for not giving up on all regional policy simply because the democratic mandate—which I would have thought that the House would regard as an important principle—should apply to decisions in the regions. People have rejected the proposal, and I have accepted that. The House should make no mistake: I am not giving up on the regional dimension and democratic accountability. I have always believed in it. I think that there is a reason for the fact that, in terms of growth, the north suffers more than the south, but in view of the decision made in the north-east, I will not proceed with a Bill.

As for Cornwall, the hon. Gentleman will be well aware of one of the first lessons that I learned about regions, and I learned it again in the north-east. People in Devon do not like Cornwall, and Cornwallites do not like Devon. People in both counties dislike Bristol and all of them hate London. In my own area, Hull and Grimsby cannot get on. When I went to the north-east, I thought that there might be a bit more of a regional identity there, but as soon as people started saying in Newcastle that Newcastle footballers were telling them to vote yes, there was not the same feeling in other parts of the region.

There are strong rivalries within regions that must be taken into account, but in general people know what constitutes a northern region and are proud to belong to it. We are doing our best to reduce the differential in prosperity between the north and the south—and, I might add, the south-west.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): The Deputy Prime Minister spoke of the growth differential between north and south. His building plans for the south will accentuate the difference, because of the resources that they will draw in to boost the south-east further. Does he not understand that the anger felt in counties such as Bedfordshire, which faces the construction of 80,000 more houses over the next 20 years as a result of his decision, is just as great as the anger that he experienced last week? Given increasing evidence of the danger of such a rate of growth, will he abandon those plans, listen to local people and show that he knows the difference between regional co-operation and regional coercion?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I was trying to recall the hon. Gentleman's constituency—[HON. MEMBERS: "It was Bury."] It is not Bury now, though. [Interruption.] Is it still Bury? If so, I apologise. But I remember the hon. Gentleman losing his seat in the north, and as he well knows the housing situation in the north is very different from that in the south. We have to meet housing demand in the south—

Mr. Redwood: Why?

The Deputy Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman has a son or a daughter, I assume that, given his circumstances, they would be able to get a house. But many people cannot afford houses or mortgages and do not want to get on a train and go north to improve their quality of life. They want to live in the south. We have shown that it is possible to build more housing by increasing density and using brownfield sites, as we have, without increasing the amount of land it takes. We must make that kind of intelligent decision rather than telling young people, "You can't live near your mum and dad and you can't have a job in the south. Go north, young man." In fact, it is possible to do both.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Will the Deputy Prime Minister let me into a secret? Was all this one of those eye-catching initiatives with which the Prime Minister wished to be personally associated?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Daft question.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): I think that that means that the answer is no.

The Deputy Prime Minister has made it clear this afternoon that elected regional assemblies are now dead, but that he is as wedded as ever to unelected regional assemblies. Can I tell him how much that will disappoint my constituents, in a week when the South East England regional assembly has come up with a maniacal proposal to build even more houses in my constituency and the rest of east Kent than he himself proposes to build?

Is that not a prime example of the way in which the South East England regional assembly is out of touch and does not reflect the views of local people in parts of Kent? It is not just a waste of money but is actively doing more harm than good to the quality of life of my constituents and many other people in the south-east. Why does the Deputy Prime Minister not admit that there is no desire for a regional dimension in the south-east and scrap the regional assembly now?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am confused by the hon. Gentleman's remarks. It was his area that wanted growth and houses, and it was his area that wanted the channel tunnel rail link to stop there. It was bound to be one of our growth areas. We think it important to do what we are doing, and the pressures that he is talking about are certainly not as great in his area as those in other southern areas that Members have mentioned. The housing will improve quality of life, and it will be connected to a damn good transport system, as we know from the announcement of the domestic services that will feature on the rail link. The hon. Gentleman should stop whining and enjoy his advantages.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): How much has this failed experiment under the Deputy Prime Minister's stewardship cost to date? Why does he not understand that what people want, whether they are in the north-east or in my region—he likes to call it East Anglia but we still like to think of ourselves as Hertfordshire, and we will fight for that all the way—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] We will, I can assure him of that. Why does he not understand that people want local services from democratic local authorities? They do not want his herd of white elephants.

The Deputy Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman's contribution was a little short on history. Did not the Tories abolish Berkshire? The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) nods. Where was the hon. Gentleman fighting then? Presumably, he was a candidate objecting to what his Government were doing.

The cost of the election in the north-east—[Interruption.] May I give the answer as best I can? The cost was £2.9 million. Elections were not held in Yorkshire and the Humber or in the north-west, but there was an information campaign, which cost approximately £10 million. Per capita, it was no more expensive—in fact, it was cheaper—than the referendums in Scotland and Wales, but if we consult people there is a price to pay. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman will object to the costs of the referendum on the European constitution. Would he say that we should not hold that because it will cost more? I suspect that the right hon. Member for Wokingham would say that it is money well spent. The hon. Gentleman's question was just a bit of argy-bargy in the Chamber, and there was no sense behind it.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I sincerely hope that last shall not be least.

The Deputy Prime Minister has advanced a strong argument for the continuing devolution of powers to local authorities, as he put it. May I ask him to follow the logic of his argument? Will he devolve back to local authorities the power to decide how many houses should be built in their areas? Surely it is better that directly elected local councillors, of whatever party, decide how many houses their area can bear, rather than having numbers imposed on them by unelected regional bodies whose moral authority has been destroyed by what happened in the north-east.

The Deputy Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman must be aware that, under the previous Administration, housing numbers were decided not by local authorities but by Government and the boards that were set up.

Mr. Francois: In negotiation.

The Deputy Prime Minister: Fine—and that is what we are doing. The south-east and eastern regions are matters for negotiation, but the previous Administration imposed housing figures on local authorities—[Interruption.] I am bound to say that they did. They imposed figures against the will of local authorities. However, the main argument is not whether the Government impose the figure but whether, if it is left to local authorities to decide the housing for a whole region, most local authorities will just vote against. Even among elected members, there is a predominance of nimbyism—we do not want it here. We are entitled to say that, if there is housing demand in an area from people who need it, we must meet that. It is a matter of negotiation between central and local government. We decided that housing boards in the region were better placed to decide from where the land was to be found to provide the houses. We think that that was right. It is a regional dimension—it is a far greater regional basis than would otherwise be the case, considering what local authorities can do with the powers in their boundary areas.

Point of Order

5.32 pm

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Mr. Luis Austin is an Argentinian from the Welsh settlement in Patagonia. He is a Welsh speaker who is visiting my constituency. Some two weeks ago, he was stopped at Gatwick airport and told that he would have to leave the country after what I can view only as a naïve breach of regulations. He was then told that he should leave the following Thursday. Some time later, he was told that he could stay until the matter was settled. Later, he was told by letter, which was sent to the wrong address, that he should leave the United Kingdom. Last Thursday, he was told that he could stay until 2 December; last Friday, he was told that he must leave tomorrow, 9 November. Unsurprisingly, he is confused. That sorry catalogue of events can only diminish the reputation of the immigration service and, importantly, damage the relationship between Patagonia, the Welsh people there and the UK, which this Government and the Administration in Cardiff have fostered. Despite all that, the Minister of State at the Home Office has refused to meet me. Can Mr. Speaker use his good offices to prevail on the Minister of State to meet me before tomorrow afternoon—before it is too late?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman, but this is not a matter for the Chair. There are channels laid down for such matters—ministerial channels and others, and he must pursue those in the normal way.

Housing Bill (Programme) (No. 3)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Orders [28 June 2001 and 6 November 2003].

That the following provisions shall apply to the Housing Bill for the purpose of supplementing the Order of 12th January 2004.

Consideration of Lords Amendments

1. Proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments shall be completed at this day's sitting.

2. Those proceedings shall be taken in the order shown in the first column of the following Table, and each part of those proceedings shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the time shown in the second column.

TABLE

Lords Amendments	Time for conclusion of proceedings
Amendments Nos. 191, 128	Two hours after the commencement of proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments.
Amendment No. 140	Two hours and 45 minutes after the commencement of those proceedings.
Amendment No. 190	Three hours and 45 minutes after the commencement of those proceedings.
Amendments Nos. 1 to 127, 129 to 139, 141 to 189 and 192 to 284	Four hours after the commencement of those proceedings or 10 pm (whichever is the later).

Subsequent stages

3. Any further Message from the Lords may be considered forthwith without any Question being put.

4. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement—[Keith Hill.]

The House divided: Ayes 291, Noes 165.

Orders of the Day

Housing Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I inform the House that privilege is involved in Lords amendments Nos. 35, 36, 51, 52, 88, 101, 103, 105, 107, 186, 190, 191, 192 and 202. If the House agrees to any of these Lords amendments, I shall arrange for the necessary entries to be made in the Journal.

New Clause

IMPROVEMENTS IN ENERGY EFFICIENCY

Lords amendment: No. 191.

5.51 pm

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

This amendment would place an obligation on the Secretary of State to take reasonable steps to ensure an increase of at least 20 per cent. in residential energy efficiency by 2010. I assure the House that the Government have absolutely no difficulty with the idea that residential energy efficiency should be increased. In debates on this issue in the other place, the Government were accused of weakening their position on that commitment, but I hope to be able to demonstrate the fallacy of that argument. I will also show that the amendment is unnecessary because existing legislation already provides the basis for setting and—just as important—reviewing energy efficiency aims.

The 2003 White Paper referred to savings of around 5 megatonnes of carbon as an indication of what we thought we could achieve at that time. With the benefit of further analysis, we have been honest enough to publicise a slightly lower figure. The energy efficiency plan of action, published last April by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, details measures that will deliver savings of 4.2, rather than 5, megatonnes of carbon in the residential sector.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Keith Hill: My hon. Friend knows that I am a big fan, but I would like to be allowed to develop my argument a little before I yield to him.

That figure is based on detailed analysis carried out following publication of the White Paper and reflects changes in economic and technical assumptions that came to light as a result of further work undertaken by DEFRA. So the Government have not sought to pull the wool over people's eyes on this issue. Indeed, the beauty of the figure of 4.2 megatonnes is that, at about 19 per cent., it is very close to the 20 per cent. improvement that this amendment seeks. Achieving 4.2 million tonnes of savings is in fact roughly equivalent to doubling the historic 1990s rate of energy efficiency improvement.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has declared an energy efficiency aim of 3.5 megatonnes of savings in England, under the Sustainable Energy Act 2003, as a contribution to the UK target of 4.2 megatonnes. The Act enables us to keep our aims under review, and improve on them where we can. DEFRA will consult shortly on the climate change programme review and we will also review our energy efficiency aim in 2007, as well as setting the target for the next phase of the energy efficiency commitment beginning in 2008. In other words, this is a constantly developing scene.

Savings of 4.2 megatonnes of carbon are not to be sniffed at, and they are not the whole story. The difference of 0.8 megatonnes between the White Paper and action plan figures will be more than compensated for by an increase in projected savings from the business and public sector. We estimate that the measures set out in the action plan will achieve carbon savings of around 12 million tonnes per annum by 2010 across all sectors. That is 20 per cent. greater than the original White Paper figure of 10 million tonnes and by 2010 is expected to save households and businesses more than £3 billion a year on their energy bills.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): There is much in what my right hon. Friend says, but is he aware that any saving in energy not only saves carbon emissions, but potentially depresses the need for nuclear energy as part of our energy sources? I would be grateful if my right hon. Friend addressed that issue and not simply that of carbon emissions, important though it is.

Keith Hill: I take my hon. Friend's thoughtful point, but I am the Minister for Housing and Planning and I am addressing the issue in the context of housing. Wider issues of energy policy are not for me. I guarantee, however, that his observation will be reported to the Department for Trade and Industry, which has responsibilities in that area.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): The Minister has tried to claim that savings on carbon emissions from the industrial sector will offset the 16 per cent. cut—it is not a small cut—in the Government's initial target. However, that does not address the issue of fuel poverty and the warm homes initiative. If a 5 megatonnes saving had been the target, it would have provided the opportunity to deliver energy efficiency in the domestic sector with corresponding savings for some of the most deprived in our communities. I would not like the Government to lose sight of that aim.

Keith Hill: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his observation. I assure him that there is no danger of the relationship between energy efficiency and fuel poverty being ignored in the course of our deliberations. In fact, it is my expectation that we will be able to discuss those issues at some length and in detail in consideration of the third group of amendments, which includes proposals on the decent homes programme. He will be aware that we have to make a distinction between issues of energy use and energy loss and issues of income. There is not necessarily a direct and obvious relationship between the two, as I will seek to argue later.

Brian White: In Committee, it was pointed out that there was a discrepancy in the way in which the figure of 4.2 megatonnes was calculated and the Minister who replied agreed to look at it again. What action has been taken to review the figure?

Keith Hill: I am certain that when Ministers make such undertakings they are followed up. I know that my hon. Friend has a deep interest in this issue—as is demonstrated by his legislative attempts—but the picture is shifting and evolving. As the technology changes, the opportunity for delivery occurs. I take his point, however, and I shall seek to ensure that those undertakings were properly pursued. I am sure that they were.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): The picture is indeed shifting, but it is important for the House to be clear about it. In the other place, Lord Bassam said that the decent homes programme would reduce carbon emissions by at least 2 megatonnes. The Government's energy efficiency plan for action, however, claims that the decent homes programme will be responsible for 0.05 megatonnes. The position has shifted, but has it really shifted that much?

Keith Hill: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will permit me two things: to develop the argument in my speech, which is primarily about energy efficiency; and to revert to the decent homes programme in our later exchanges. I am, however, grateful to him for putting the issue on the record. At an appropriate point, I might be better placed to answer it.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): A number of Members are obviously concerned about the amendment. I welcome my right hon. Friend's commitment to further review, but in the light both of debates on the Energy Bill and of the Environmental Audit Committee's recommendations to the Government, will he give the House an assurance that he will find some mechanism in the review to consider what his Department, DEFRA and the DTI are doing so that we can be certain that we have the best possible standards for dealing with energy efficiency as the cheapest, cleanest and safest way to reduce CO_2 emissions?

Keith Hill: I am happy to give my hon. Friend that assurance, and I do not do so in a facile fashion. This is an aspect of genuine joined-up government—to use that familiar and slightly cod phrase. Indeed, I recently met DEFRA Ministers precisely to discuss such issues. Other Ministers were present, as well as representatives from other Departments, so the issues are genuinely being addressed across the board, and I hope that my hon. Friend finds that, at least, reassuring.

I was setting out certain points about the progress that we have already made on the action plan and the objectives for energy and carbon savings, which go beyond those originally identified in the 2003 White Paper. It is important that those points are put on the record. They have certainly been raised in previous debates, but it does no harm to reiterate them. That is not all. More energy efficiency measures are being backed by firm policy commitments than ever before. I highlight two key measures: we expect condensing boilers to be installed faster under the 2005 building regulations than anticipated in the energy White Paper, and we expect installations of cavity wall insulation to more than double under the next phase of the energy efficiency commitment, which puts obligations on energy suppliers to achieve energy efficiency gains.

I regard the amendment as well intentioned but unnecessary and inflexible. We are already working towards its objective. Setting a numerical target in primary legislation will not help us to pursue an open, technically sound, evolving approach to the setting of objectives and targets.

Although I recognise the genuine interest in the issue shown by hon. Members on both sides of the House and have listened to debates in this place and read those that took place elsewhere, I have been struck by the approach of some Opposition Members. Their zeal for the amendment has not been matched by their approach to other provisions in the Bill that would in fact help their case. I am thinking particularly of the home condition reports that will form part of the home information packs under part 5. The EU directive on energy performance of buildings will make it compulsory for home sellers to provide energy efficiency information on their home to potential buyers. That is entirely reasonable. We know that most improvements to homes take place when keen new owners take over.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): I am grateful to the Minister for giving way and I apologise for not being in the Chamber for the beginning of his remarks.

Does not the EU directive require certification of energy efficiency to be given only when the house is sold and not when the property is marketed? Is not that key to the Minister's proposals for home condition reports?

Keith Hill: We will have an opportunity to discuss those matters and, in due course, I want to go into a little more detail about the inter-relationship of the energy and home condition reports. The EU directive will require an energy report at every point of sale and that will be part and parcel of the home information pack.

Although the Opposition favour compulsory energy efficiency reports—at least, the Liberal Democrats favour them—they do not support the very means whereby they will be delivered cost-effectively: compulsory home condition reports as part of a compulsory home information pack. Those reports will contain information about the energy efficiency of homes when they are marketed. Compulsory home information packs, with data about the energy efficiency of a property and what a new owner can do to improve it, will capture that moment. Voluntary packs risk frittering that opportunity. We will return to the issue when we debate the next group of amendments.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend about the mechanisms to improve energy efficiency, but what I cannot quite understand is why he thinks that the 20 per cent. target would be inflexible. If we overshot it and did better, that would be fine, but is not it good to have the target, to fix the Government's mind and to ensure that we reach the minimum necessary to achieve our overall goals? After all, let us not forget that our overall goal is a 60 per cent. reduction in CO_2 emissions by 2050.

Keith Hill: But we are already almost at that 20 per cent. point—achieved by mechanisms that may not have been anticipated even two years ago. When we are moving towards the target, with which my hon. Friend is properly concerned, it seems unnecessary to add this provision to the Bill and set a numerical target, which may be overshot or outdated but none the less adds a degree of inflexibility. Indeed, it might even encourage a degree of complacency. Let us have neither suspicion of the Government's intentions nor encouragement to complacency. Let us not make an unnecessary amendment to the Bill.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole) (Con): It has been a fair time since we debated these issues in Committee, and one could have predicted that they would come back at this point. The upper House has done us a favour by bringing the matter back to our attention.

The amendment is not unreasonable. It is not unreasonable that

> "the Secretary of State shall take reasonable steps to ensure an increase in residential energy efficiency of at least 20% by 2010 based upon 2000 levels."

The Government included that commitment in their manifesto, so it could not have seemed too inflexible then. They said that they would decrease CO_2 emissions by 20 per cent. by 2010 based on 1990 levels. From 1990 to 1997, carbon emissions decreased by 13.1 million tonnes. Since the Government were elected in 1997, such emissions remained almost static, but in three of the past four years they have increased.

In August, the Environmental Audit Committee reported that the Government's latest forecasts indicated that by 2010 carbon emissions would be 8 million cubic tonnes more than the target—a 25 per cent. shortfall. That target is the Government's target; they have assured the public no fewer than 15 times that it would be the energy efficiency aim set under the Sustainable Energy Act 2003. Some members of the Government have promoted that target. On 17 August, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry wrote to Mr. J. Card of Hereford:

> "I hope the above helps to convince you that the Government has put in place measures to deliver the expected 5 million tonnes of carbon from household energy efficiency savings."

The Government's sustainable energy policy network website lists as an objective delivery by 2010 of

> "additional emissions reductions in households of around 3.5 million cubic tonnes . . . beyond those envisaged"— that is, 1.5 million cubic tonnes—

> "in the UK Climate Change Programme".

That equals 5 million cubic tonnes, or the 20 per cent. specified in the amendment. The site also states that it is a Government "commitment" to deliver > "improvements in household energy efficiency of 5 million cubic tonnes by 2010", which is exactly what the amendment says.

The DEFRA website lists the target under the Home Energy Conservation Act 1995 as a 30 per cent. improvement in 10 to 15 years, using the baseline of 1 April 1996. Taking that as its lowest—30 per cent. over 15 years, based on 1996 levels—it is virtually the same as 20 per cent. over 10 years, as in the Lords amendment. Indeed, the Energy Saving Trust—the Government's own adviser—does not know why the target has been changed to 16 per cent. It has been completely surprised by the sudden decrease and has said so publicly, as it has worked on the policies to achieve the higher figure of 20 per cent. In evidence to the Environmental Audit Committee on 19 May, it said:

> "We were involved in developing the Plan"

but

> "we have to say that we did not have the final decision"

in respect of the reduction

> "and we do not agree with it."

As support for the 20 per cent. target will come from Opposition and Government Members, the real issue is why the Government have decided to change the target. After all, the Lords amendment uses the phrase "reasonable steps". I have served on enough Committees to know that "reasonable" is not an unreasonable word to use in legislation. The target does not necessarily have to be achieved, but the Government must take reasonable steps to achieve it. The Lords amendment is not unreasonable. It would set this country's policies in the context of international relations at a responsible level, and it should be supported.

I note that early-day motion 96, on the residential energy efficiency aim pursuant to the Sustainable Energy Act 2003, has accumulated more than 340 signatures. Given that Ministers would not sign an early-day motion, two thirds of all the Back Benchers in Parliament must have signed it. I would not suggest that Members of Parliament would sign any early-day motion lightly on such an important matter that has an impact on the future and sensible energy policies. That shows the breadth of support for the 20 per cent. target. The Lords have given us an opportunity to think again, and I hope that the House will adopt a sensible approach and vote for the 20 per cent. target.

Brian White: The Lords amendment is very important, and I agree with the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) that their lordships have done us a good service by introducing it. Reference has been made already to the Sustainable Energy Act 2003, which I piloted through the House a couple of years ago, and early-day motion 96, so I want to concentrate on what the Government said in opposing the amendment in the Lords last week, which the Minister has just repeated.

Last week, Lord Rooker said that 4.2 megatonnes is double the historic 1990s level. That is welcome, and we should not lose sight of the fact that there has been a major change. In the energy White Paper, the Government said why the target was important, and they set the aspiration at a 20 per cent. reduction. The problem is that officials began to realise that an historic step change would be required and that a number of issues need to be addressed.

Lord Rooker argued for flexibility and said that the 2003 Act provides a mechanism to increase the level—it certainly does—but that is not a reason why the Lords amendment, which would set a floor, should not be carried. The Lords amendment would set in statute a floor beneath which Government aspirations should not fall. If the Government want to exceed that baseline, they can use the mechanism in the Act to go way above it.

The Minister rightly referred to the action plan, which contains many good points; but, again, that does not negate the need for the Lords amendment. The Government have also argued that we are doing well in the industrial and business sector, so we should be allowed to slip in another sector, but this is not a zero-sum game. Our aspiration should be to exceed the level in every sector.

Lord Rooker also said that the Government have a good tale to tell. The Government are not reneging on their commitments, despite what the Opposition have said, but they are scoring a classic own goal. We have a good tale to tell, but because we are not living up to what we said in the White Paper and we are arguing about 4.2 megatonnes as against 5 megatonnes, we are scoring an own goal for no good reason.

6.15 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend not agree that set as we may undershoot our CO_2 emission reduction targets by about 25 per cent., as reported by the Environmental Audit Committee, to pass up what the White Paper called the cheapest, cleanest and safest way to reduce carbon emissions—energy efficiency—seems perverse, to put it mildly?

Brian White: My hon. Friend makes the key point. Energy efficiency is the best and most effective way to achieve our goals. Whether we are talking about tackling climate change, reducing carbon emissions or taking people out of fuel poverty, energy efficiency is a key policy instrument that the Government must use. By embracing the Lords amendment, the Government would be going with the flow, rather than trying to find a justification for resisting it, when everyone interested in the issue knows that the White Paper provided the right aspiration and the right policy.

In May, during the debates on the Energy Bill in Committee, the Minister said that the energy commitment would be reviewed in 2007—he has repeated that today—but he also thought that the non-statutory commitment would lead to a substantial stepping up of activity. Unfortunately, that has not been the case. If I am right and the increase has not been sufficient, not holding the review until 2007, with implementation in 2008, leaves very little time to achieve our goals.

The Minister also said that dialogue with the industry was needed to ensure that the serious disappointment that has been expressed until now does not recur, but that disappointment has been reinforced by the resistance to this very sensible Lords amendment. We have been down this route before with combined heat and power, when we made similar statements with consequences for the CHP industry. We are in danger of doing the same with energy efficiency.

[Brian White]

I have often quoted Bryan Carsberg saying that regulators think that if something is not in the statute, it does not exist. What is true for regulators is also true for officials. Such a proposal has been around for a long time. Indeed, it was part of my original Sustainable Energy Bill. When a ministerial reshuffle took place during the consideration of that Bill, officials said that they would oppose it, although it had been agreed before, and their words are etched on my brain:

> "That may have been ministerial policy, but it is not departmental policy."

That is the nub of the problem, and those words struck home. If officials do not see something in statute and do not agree with it, it will not happen. There must be a statutory requirement to allow officials to act. That is why the performance and innovation unit's report was so important and why the energy White Paper was so insistent on the 20 per cent. target.

Everyone agrees that the era of low energy prices, which helped to lift millions out of fuel poverty, is over. We are in a different global environment, so we must consider how to take more people out of fuel poverty. At a recent energy company's annual general meeting, someone said:

> "The consequences for companies that do not act responsibly and take steps to assess and mitigate risks posed by climate change will be just as devastating as the recent corporate scandals."

What is true for companies is also true for Governments.

Next summer, the UK will hold the presidencies of the G8 and the EU, and the Prime Minister has rightly made tackling climate change a key objective. Never has the old adage "Think global, act local" been so true. If we do not take on board the Lords amendment, we will negate all the words we use and cause problems at home and abroad. It will give our opponents—whether political opponents at home or countries that oppose the Kyoto protocol—the excuse not to take the action that is desperately needed if we are to take climate change seriously.

The Prime Minister is right to focus on the international context next year, but we do not need to erect unnecessary barriers, which we will do if we do not accept the Lords amendment. We can hardly criticise the United State if we seem to run away from a sensible amendment. This ought to be a no-brainer, given the list of people who support the target, which includes the energy industry, energy efficiency companies, campaigners from various non-governmental organisation, Friends of the Earth, Greenpeace, the Women's Institute, Shelter and tenants' organisations.

All the political parties signed up to the proposal—all their green wings have endorsed it—and some 340 MPs from all parties signed up to the aspiration. The wording of the early-day motion was carefully discussed with Ministers and officials, and the figures were checked with officials several times. All of them suggested a figure of 20 per cent, not 16 per cent. The 20 per cent. figure was reaffirmed on 24 occasions, 15 of which were ministerial statements. It was confirmed only a few days before the actual target was announced.

The Minister says that there is only a small difference between targets of 16 and 20 per cent., so why is it a problem to accept the Lords amendment as a basis on which we can move forward? There is a mechanism by which we can go above the target, but we need a statutory floor. Whatever words the Government use, they will send a clear message by disagreeing with the Lords amendment: the matter is not a priority, and the market need not deliver because slippage is okay. That message would be totally wrong. It would go against everything that the Government are trying to do and all the good things that Departments have done.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that the all-party warm homes group has taken evidence showing that industry wants to invest in products that would lead to greater energy efficiency? That would create jobs, so there would be a win-win situation all round: we would not only reduce CO_2 emissions and the utility bills of people in fuel poverty, but increase jobs in industry.

Brian White: As I say, this should be a no-brainer. I ask the Minister to rethink his position and accept the Lords amendment. I do not understand why he wants to turn the win-win situation that my hon. Friend described into a no win situation in which we would be accused of reneging on commitments. The story that we have to tell is good, and we have made excellent achievements, so we need to seize the opportunity of achieving a long-held Labour aspiration. We should not give our political opponents a stick with which to beat us, or erect unnecessary barriers that would hinder next year's G8 negotiations.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): The Minister described the figures as a shifting, moving picture. The shifting and moving has been on the Government's part, because they have moved from their stated target of 5 megatonnes of carbon down to 4.2 megatonnes. He says that that would result in a 19 per cent. target on carbon rather than a 20 per cent. one, and asks what everyone is getting so worked up about. I suspect that the figure is closer to 18 per cent. than 19 per cent.—

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): It is 16 per cent.

Matthew Green: Well, the reduction would be 16 per cent., but the Minister said that the overall effect would be equivalent to a 19 per cent. target. However, if the difference between the targets is so small, why will the Government not agree to the 20 per cent. target? Why is a target of 19 per cent. more achievable than one of 20 per cent.? The Government must know something that the rest of us do not. There must be a reason why a 19 per cent. target can be achieved easily, but 20 per cent. is out of reach. I am struggling to understand what that is, so when the Minister winds up the debate, I hope that he will set out why the Government are confident that they will meet the 19 per cent. target, yet fail to meet 20 per cent. The projections that his officials are making must be really tight to enable him to reach that conclusion.

By my count, at least 150 Labour Members signed the early-day motion—[HON. MEMBERS: "Over 200."] I am being told that the figure is more than 200. [Interruption.] Well, the bigger the number gets, the more uncomfortable the Minister looks. I hope that the Labour Members who signed the early-day motion will back that up with their votes.

There is a lot of good in the Bill—[Interruption.] There are some bad things as well. However, as there is a lot of good in it, we do not want to descend into a process of ping-pong between the Lords and the Commons. The easiest way for us to avoid that would be to accept the Lords amendment. If Labour Members were to stick to their guns, we would not have to send the Bill back to the Lords because we could pass it now. That would get the Minister out of a bind, because it would make the Whips happy if we did not get into ping-pong. The Minister used to be a Whip, so he knows all about that.

Hon. Members have posed good questions already, yet the Minister made great play of the fact that the target in the amendment is only just above the Government's proposal, but if there is such a small difference, the higher target must be achievable, unless he knows something that the rest of us do not. It is very strange for the Government to say that we should resist the amendment because we will get awfully close to the target in it anyway, but that is essentially the position that they have adopted.

I hope that the Minister will make the difference between the targets clear and explain why there is so much at stake that he will resist the amendment. Energy efficiency has been described as one of the Government's key objectives, and proposals have been made by the Cabinet Office performance and innovation unit, so there is clearly support for it high up in Government. The Government's Sustainable Development Commission has used the 20 per cent. figure, and we have heard that it has been cited in letters even recently. I do not understand why the Minister is resisting the amendment. The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) described the decision as a no-brainer, so the Minister must come clean and tell us what is at stake if we change the target from 19 to 20 per cent.

Alan Simpson: We need to put the debate in the context of the best aspects of the Government's record. For the first time in history, the Labour Government gave a statutory undertaking to eradicate fuel poverty in this country by 2016. The Government and the Labour party should rightly be proud of that awesome commitment. Equally, the Prime Minister made it clear to the House that meeting Britain's Kyoto targets was a statutory and binding obligation. He has also said that addressing the challenge of climate change will be the centrepiece of the next Labour Government, so the amendment should be at the heart of what Labour has tried to stand for: taking people out of fuel poverty while meeting our broader global obligations to tackle climate change. It is thus bizarre and somewhat absurd that the Government refuse to endorse the targets in the amendment that successive Labour Ministers have affirmed as Government policy. We are having an "Alice Through the Looking Glass" debate that has been constructed by officials in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, rather than Labour Ministers or the Labour party.

The reduction of the carbon target from 5 megatonnes to 4.2 megatonnes has been justified on the ground that it was done on the basis of the best available evidence at the time. People have asked the nature of that evidence and where it came from, but it has not been adequately justified. Our advisers, the Fuel Poverty Advisory Group, said that it was at a loss to understand why the Government wanted to introduce a lower target. I think that in this Bill, as in those that have preceded it, civil servants have been faced with the prospect of targets, but rather than asking how they can meet them, they have asked how they can lower the hurdle. They want to know how they can appear to be meeting Government targets without breaking a sweat. There is a conflict not between different parties in the House, but between the House—it knows the policies that came from the Government—and the civil servants who have the job of writing measures to deliver and implement Government policy. They should not rewrite such policies to give themselves an easier life while leaving everyone else with bigger problems.

6.30 pm

The Minister understandably rebuffed the question of whether that would contribute to our ability to choose not to go down the nuclear path by saying that it was not in his remit to address energy industry issues because we are merely discussing a Bill on housing. That is perfectly fair. By the same token, however, he cannot try to shelter from reducing carbon savings as a result of improving household energy efficiency by saying that other savings would be met and exceeded in other parts of industry. We made specific commitments in relation to the housing sector and it is against those commitments that we are being asked to define a position in the Bill.

Hon. Members have counted the number of Labour MPs who signed the early-day motion, with different results.

David Taylor: It is 229.

Alan Simpson: It seems that the figure is now 229.

Someone said that it is hard to find a loser, but there are 230 potential losers—the 229 Labour MPs who signed the early-day motion in good faith and the country. Those commitments are not abstract figures. They will affect the quality of life of the most fuel-poor people in the country. The Government need to accept that the challenge that faces us is to stand by the commitments that we have made.

In a letter on behalf of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs dated 28 October, Alan Clifford of the sustainable energy policy division wrote to Mr. Robson, chair of the Association for the Conservation of Energy and a member of the Government's Fuel Poverty Advisory Group, in an attempt to rationalise why the lower figure of 4.2 million tonnes of carbon emissions was being set. He said:

> "the White Paper figure was based on the best information available at the time, and was not a target."

Unfortunately, we are getting into the realms of pantomime. Civil servants may consistently say that the figure was not a target, but other voices in the background say that it was. The Labour manifesto said:

> "We will lead the fight against global warming, through our target of a 20 per cent. reduction in carbon dioxide emissions by 2010."

[Alan Simpson]

So that target was defined in the manifesto.

The letter went on to say that the energy efficiency action plan, published in 2004, reduced the target to 4.2 million tonnes because that was deemed to be the appropriate figure. So the 5 million tonnes was not a fixed figure. However, when the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) asked the Prime Minister:

> "Will he make it clear that there is no truth in the interpretation that has been put on the comments of some Ministers that Britain will stick to the new Government's 20 per cent. target for cuts to CO_2 emissions only if other countries co-operate in cutting their emissions? Will he confirm that our target is not conditional on the action of others?", his response could not have been clearer. He said:

> "It is not a conditional target".—[Official Report, 24 June 1997; Vol. 296, c. 687–88.]

We have targets that are defined as unconditional; targets that are defined as a quantum; targets that are defined by a succession of Labour Ministers; and targets that are endorsed, approved and supported by 229 Labour Members. I suspect that the overwhelming majority of local authorities, non-governmental organisations and everyone who works in the environment and fuel poverty sector all envisaged us setting and standing by our targets. The question that will baffle the public is why on earth we would want to renege on them now.

The Minister said that there was a danger that setting the target would create a mood of complacency and we would be held back, but the final paragraph of Alan Clifford's letter nails the lie of that when he says:

> "it has always been recognised that additional measures might be needed to achieve the domestic goal of a 20 per cent. reduction in carbon dioxide emissions below 1990 levels by 2010."

By setting the lower figure of 4.2 million tonnes, there is a calculated level of under-achievement in which officials recognise that the Government will be forced to identify other measures. Why do we build in a guarantee of failure to meet the targets that we have set for ourselves when it is within in our reach to do so and to stand by the commitments that we made?

Hon. Members are right to say that the energy efficiency industry waits for us—pleads with us—to set those targets, which it will meet. It is incomprehensible that the Minister asks the House to set lower standards when our original targets are within our reach and we should stand by them. I am not asking him to do a Dolly Parton and stand by our man, but I am asking him to stand by our manifesto, which would be welcomed by the public and the party.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): I shall be brief because I agree with every word my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) and the hon. Members for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White), for Ludlow (Matthew Green) and for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) said. I declare a possible non-financial interest. For many years, I was a qualified architect, but for much of that time I was off the drawing board and now receive no income from my erstwhile profession. Indeed, I said in Committee and before that I have a reverse interest to declare because for years I paid professional subscriptions to the Royal Institute of British Architects to no avail.

I feel a sense of sadness about the proposal. I honestly do not think that there was any need for the Government to resile from their commitment to improve energy efficiency by 20 per cent. by 2010 on 2000 AD levels. They have made a tactical mistake, and I shall set out why. As hon. Members have said, they repeatedly assured us that that target would be set. My hon. Friend the Member for Poole said that they repeated that 15 times. The target has got into the public psyche, which is good and heart-warming. It has also been fully supported by the Energy Saving Trust, the Sustainable Development Commission, the Government's official advisers and at least two other Departments—the Department of Trade and Industry and DEFRA. I cannot understand why the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has suddenly decided to revise it.

The plan is to save 4.2 megatonnes of carbon rather than 5 megatonnes. That is a reduction of 16 per cent., which is significant. However, as other hon. Members said, the revised target means that we will hit only a 19 per cent. overall improvement in energy efficiency instead of 20 per cent. by 2010. Overall, the House supports the Government in the early-day motion that has been tabled. I hope that the number of Labour Members who support the proposal does not increase, as that detracts from the all-party nature of the issue, for which there is general support. I shall not be here in 2010, but if I am correct, my colleagues, whether they belong to the Government or the Opposition, will not feel a sense of triumph if the Government fail. There will be a sense of sadness, combined with respect for the fact that the Government kept to their original target. Even at the 59th minute of the 11th hour, I beseech the Minister, for whom I have a very strong regard, to change his mind or seek to persuade the Government to do so.

In conclusion, the Government have set myriad targets—some people may say too many—throughout the field of government. I am a member of the Public Administration Committee, which produced a report on Government targets. We may have complained that there are too many targets, some of which contradict others, but we have never suggested that pinpointed targets are anything other than a good thing for the Government to try to achieve. If the Government do not accept the Lords amendment, which was tabled by Baroness Hanham on 3 November, they will detract from the efficacy of their target-setting policies. I beseech the Minister, who represents Streatham—I must remember not to say "St. Reatham"—to reconsider his position, as he will win tremendous all-party support not only from hon. Members but from the public at large, persuading them that we take the issue of energy savings and energy efficiency very seriously indeed.

Ms Walley: I shall make a brief speech, as I hope that in his reply the Minister will take on board the many points made by Members on both sides of the House.

I religiously signed the early-day motions because I believed in them and in the original target. We must be careful not to devalue targets by suggesting that a target that cannot be met provides a perverse incentive and undermines the system. Many hon. Members passionately want the original target to be met and to be applied to energy efficiency. My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) set out our aims clearly, and I urge the Minister to persuade the Government to address the reports and debate on the issue. If the target cannot be included in the Bill, will he give us an assurance that we can meet what we set out to achieve—the basic floor target of 20 per cent. savings?

Mr. McWalter: I am sure that, like us, the Minister is strongly in favour of abolishing fuel poverty and meeting achievable targets on insulation with a hard-working programme. I do not believe that that is at issue. However, I would like to know why he believes that it is inappropriate and wrong to include the 20 per cent. target in primary legislation. Does he fear, for instance, that the Government could be taken to court gratuitously if the Lords amendment is accepted? Would a lot of legal time be taken up defending slow-burning Government programmes? Why does he agree with everything that has been said in favour of the target, but object to its inclusion in primary legislation?

6.45 pm

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): I will not delay the House long, as I merely seek clarification.

It is obviously difficult for the Government to change their mind. Had the Bill received pre-legislative scrutiny, they might have been able to do so. However, once a Government have decided to push through a measure, it is usually impossible for them to change their mind.

I have just one question for the Minister. The Lords amendment says that

> "the Secretary of State shall take reasonable steps to ensure an increase in residential energy efficiency of at least 20 per cent. by 2010 based upon 2000 levels."

Will the Minister clarify the Government's position? Is it that he supports the target but does not want to include it in the Bill? His reply will help hon. Members who signed early-day motion 96 to consider their position before voting against the Government.

Keith Hill: Let me provide immediate assurance to my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) that the Government support the 20 per cent. target and, indeed, as I have argued, we are in the process of meeting it.

I am alarmed by the tone taken by some of my hon. Friends. There is no hidden agenda or conspiracy. May I tell my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) that the Government have not reneged on their commitments—we are delivering on them, as I have previously said, and as I shall go on to demonstrate. I respect the expertise of my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White), who protested that we have not accepted the terms of the amendment, even though, somehow, we have already agreed to its substance in legislative form. We have not done so, but we are not withdrawing or resiling from our commitments. To be entirely accurate, the figure of 5 million tonnes of carbon savings in the residential sector was never the Government's stated aim, but an initial indication in the energy White Paper of what could be achieved. However, our record stands in its own right. The 4.2 million tonnes of carbon savings that have been mentioned in our debate represent a significant increase in activity on current levels, and will require a major increase in delivery by the industry. Our latest calculations indicate that that total corresponds to an increase in efficiency of about 19 per cent. compared with 2000 levels.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Keith Hill: No, I am afraid that I do not have time.

We expect a significant increase in overall carbon savings from energy efficiency. The energy efficiency action plan details measures to make estimated carbon savings of 12 million tonnes of carbon—a 20 per cent. increase compared with the rough figures in the energy White Paper, which predicted savings of 10 million tonnes of carbon to 2010. I repeat, therefore, that we are genuinely succeeding in meeting our energy efficiency targets, so the Lords amendment is simply unnecessary. There are no grounds for doubting the Government's commitment and we are getting there by making carbon savings across the board.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) raised the relationship between energy efficiency targets and fuel poverty. He will know that that relationship, about which colleagues and I share serious concern, is not unilateral. We will have an opportunity to debate it later this evening, but I remind him that measures in the energy efficiency action plan play an important part in combating fuel poverty. As he and the House will know, there has been a steady reduction in the number of households in fuel poverty, which we can discuss in more detail later. However, I remind the House that the fuel poverty action plan for England, which will be published later this year, will set out how the Government expect to meet the target of eradicating fuel poverty in vulnerable households by 2010. I therefore invite the House to disagree with the Lords amendment.

Question put, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendment disagreed to.

Clause 137

DUTY TO HAVE A HOME INFORMATION PACK

Lords amendment: No. 128.

Keith Hill: I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 130, 135, 137, 143 and 144 and the Government motions to disagree thereto.

Keith Hill: It is a matter of great regret to me that the issue of home information packs has remained so contentious between the parties, especially when there has been such broad consensus about the Bill and we have been able to work so well together. That applies not least to work between the Government and the Liberal Democrats in improving the Bill, especially the provisions on empty homes and tenancy deposits.

The amendments would replace a compulsory home information pack scheme with a voluntary one. The notion of voluntarism is seductive and there was much talk in the other place of the reforms being an unjustified restriction on people's right to buy and sell homes as they please in a market that functions perfectly well as it is. However, those of us who inhabit the real world know that that is not the case. The home buying and selling process does not function properly. Hundreds of thousands of people every year are put through the wringer because of the inadequacies of the current system. Hundreds of millions of pounds are wasted on transactions that get nowhere. That is money that ordinary, hard-working families can ill afford to lose.

Three out of 10 sales fall through between offer acceptance and exchange of contracts and more than half of all sales experience some sort of problem during that period. It is no wonder that, whenever they are asked, people say that they are hugely dissatisfied with the current system. Nine out of 10 people said that in one independent survey last year. That is hardly a ringing endorsement for a system that is supposed to work well.

I do not doubt that some people are doing very nicely out of the system. Every cloud has a silver lining and the abortive costs to consumers from all those failed transactions represent a nice little earner for others. Needless to say, they are not the people for whom the reforms are designed, although many in the industry welcome what we are doing and are keen to get on with it. For them, the reforms are overdue and liberating, enabling them to offer the sort of service that their customers want.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Keith Hill: Of course I shall give way to my guru on home information packs and so much else.

Mr. Kidney: Surely my right hon. Friend does not suggest that the lawyers and estate agents who object to the home information packs are the ones who benefit from an inefficient system.

Keith Hill: As I was wont to say in my previous incarnation as deputy Chief Whip, my hon. Friend may say that but I could not possibly comment.

[Keith Hill]

Opponents of compulsion should recognise that relying on voluntarism would mean things staying much as they are. That is because a voluntary HIP system will not achieve the universal acceptance needed to make it work properly. The amendments are really about removing part 5 from the Bill, thus leaving the housing market unreformed and damaging not only to individual buyers and sellers, but to the national economy. Too many people are disadvantaged for us to ignore the problems and settle for the status quo. We are determined to offer consumers a genuine prospect of change. That cannot be done through relying on voluntarism and good will alone.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Keith Hill: I shall, but I have much to say and relatively little time in which to say it. I also want to allow other hon. Members to speak.

Peter Bottomley: The Minister is trying to reverse a Lords amendment and get the House's approval for that and I am grateful to him for allowing me to ask a question. If I approach someone who is not planning to sell a home and ask them whether they will sell it to me, is it lawful for them to do that without providing a home information pack?

Keith Hill: The answer to that is an unqualified yes.

Of course, there are a few agents who have sought to progress on the basis that I have described. They report none of the dire consequences predicted by the Opposition, although they are frustrated that others can reap the benefit of their efforts without having to do very much. In a buoyant housing market, that is not surprising. In a downturn, they might need to work harder, but unless they pull in the same direction, more effort can be ineffective.

All markets work most efficiently when all the parties are well informed, and the housing market is no exception. Nobody disputes that. The home information pack will deliver that for home buyers and sellers. We do not need a Bill just to have a voluntary system of home information packs. Sellers and estate agents are free to provide them now if that is what they want. However, despite the evidence that they can greatly reduce the chances of transaction failure, they have not gained a sizeable foothold in the home buying and selling process. There are very good reasons for that.

The main problem with a voluntary scheme is chains. If any link in the chain is without a pack, the whole chain would suffer if that were to be the cause of problems. If packs are not made compulsory, one individual who decides to opt out can wreck the process for everyone else. We also know that estate agents in the high street are fiercely competitive, and without compulsion, most of them will be tempted to offer the easy option. Without the level-playing field that a compulsory scheme will bring about, most estate agents, even those sympathetic to HIPs would look at what their competitors were doing and would not act for the greater good of consumers if they felt that it would put them at a commercial disadvantage.

There have been accusations that the introduction of compulsory HIPs will mean a huge reduction in the number of properties going to the market and that that will result in massive house price inflation. That would be scary if it were true, but it is just the usual scaremongering. The introduction of similar changes in Denmark and New South Wales had no effect on the market. That view is also supported by research commissioned by the UK's largest estate agency group—the Countrywide group—which suggested that there would be little impact on the number of homes sold. The Countrywide study found that, even if sellers had to pay up front for the pack, 87 per cent. would still offer their home for sale. It concluded that the pack would take out of the market only the people who were not serious about selling anyway.

Mr. Simon Thomas: According to my understanding of the proposals, the Minister will decide at what stage to commence this part of the Bill. Will he tell us how he would do that, because that decision would have an impact on the market? Will he introduce the provision throughout the United Kingdom overnight, or will it be piloted in certain areas—perhaps in Wales; why not?—and what ideas does he have about ensuring that it will actually work?

Keith Hill: The hon. Gentleman has been a good supporter of this proposal, and he is articulating a reasonable concern about its implementation. After all, there are few things in life more important than a person's home and their acquisition of it. I can give him an absolute assurance that we shall not bring this system in until we are absolutely clear that it is going to work. We envisage various kinds of dry run to ensure that it is working properly and I hope to talk about that in due course, in a way that I hope he will find helpful.

I was saying that there had been accusations that the introduction of compulsory HIPs would mean a huge reduction in the number of properties going to the market, and that the evidence was that there would be no such reduction. Indeed, I pray in aid on this matter no less a figure than Kate Barker of the Bank of England's Monetary Policy Committee, who has spoken about the problems of the current home buying and selling system and about how HIPs will help. In her recent report on housing, she said:

> "An efficient housing market depends on buyers and sellers having available to them accurate and comprehensive information about individual properties as early as possible. This is often not the case at present, and as a result many transactions fail or take longer than necessary."

She went on to say that HIPs would address that market failure and should reduce the risk of transaction failure and speed up the buying and selling process, provided that they were properly researched with the industry and consumers. We certainly intend to do that. She finished by saying of HIPs:

> "I welcome the greater transparency that they are expected to bring, and would not anticipate that there will be an impact on house prices as a result of their introduction."

7.15 pm

Sir John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) (Con): Will the Minister tell me what particular expertise Kate Barker has in the home buying and selling markets?

Mr. Edward Davey: She is a macro-economist.

Sir John Butterfill: She is, but I do not know whether she has any great expertise in this area.

Keith Hill: If the hon. Gentleman had read Kate Barker's report on housing—he might well have done so—which was commissioned jointly by my Department and the Treasury, he could not have helped being impressed by her deep understanding, the great extent of her expertise and the enormous trouble that she took to analyse the housing market and to get these things right. I do not know which authority the hon. Gentleman wants to promote in opposition to Kate Barker but, frankly, I am content to rest on her judgment that this system would not impact on house prices in any negative sense, and that it would make the housing market more efficient.

The provision of more and better information cannot help but improve the functioning of the housing market, although I do not pretend that it will solve every problem. We accept that our proposals are not a panacea. However, every examination of these problems by Governments over the past 30 years—and there have been a number, in case anyone is labouring under the delusion that these are new problems—has concluded that this would be the most helpful change. My noble Friend Lord Rooker listed some of those conclusions recently in another place. There was the Law Commission report on subject-to-contract agreements, which was laid before Parliament as long ago as January 1975. Then there was the first report of the Conveyancing committee in 1984, better known as the Farrand report. The previous Conservative Government's report, "Survey of options for simplifying the house purchase process", published in 1993—I presume under the auspices of the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who is in his place—responded to concerns about inefficiencies in the market and concluded that sellers should provide property details at the outset and that conveyancers could reduce the uncertainties of chains by encouraging a greater disclosure of information.

None of this is new. The problems are not new and the solutions are not new. What is new is that we now have a Government who have the courage to do something about it, even if that means upsetting a few interests along the way. While I am on the subject of interests, let me draw to the attention of the House a couple of interests that have recently come out in support of the Government's proposals. As a Labour man, I have been reading The Guardian devotedly for more than 40 years, although nowadays, opening my copy often feels like a somewhat masochistic exercise. To my delight, however, I saw that the editorial in the edition of Saturday 6 November contained a most enthusiastic expression of opinion in support of the Government's proposals on home information packs. And, lo and behold, in The Times of Friday 5 November, the excellent Susan Emmett, its deputy property editor also wrote enthusiastically about the ending of what she described as "this tortuous process" of home sale and purchase. If I had more time, I should certainly draw these serious observations to the attention of the House. I shall spare hon. Members that experience now, although I might get the opportunity to do it later. I will simply say that when the muesli and sandals brigade lines up with "The Thunderer" in joint support of the Government's proposals, those proposals must be taken very seriously.

Unlike the Opposition, we have a coherent view of what is needed to create a sustainable housing market. Apart from making an effort to balance the supply and demand for housing responsibly, we want to ensure that the existing stock is maintained and kept in good repair for future generations. We want to see people taking responsibility for their stewardship of the housing stock, including its upkeep and energy efficiency. They can do that only if they have the necessary information at the right time and in the right place.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): The Minister mentions energy efficiency. I wonder why. My concern is that the Secretary of State is taking powers whereby he "may" do this, that or the other. Why did he not state categorically from the outset that he would institute a mechanism whereby the proper energy efficiency rating of every house could be presented, enabling people to make a comparison?

Keith Hill: The right hon. Gentleman entices me on to the next phase of my exposition of the virtues of our proposals, but I am surprised that he, as a good European, is unaware of European Union directive 2002/91/EC, which makes such an energy efficiency report mandatory.

Mr. Gummer: I was inviting the Minister to explain why the Secretary of State did not take credit for this, as is his wont, by getting it in the original documentation.

Keith Hill: The right hon. Gentleman will have to put that down to my innate modesty. After all, he will acknowledge that I have not attempted to replace the concept of the Gummer exception with the Hill exception. This is a rather arcane exchange, albeit one that we have both enjoyed.

The Opposition have failed to make any link between their laudable demands for more and better use of the existing stock in creating sustainable communities, including higher energy and other standards, and the crucial role that HIPs will play in achieving those ends.

As I was saying to the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal, we shall have compulsory energy surveys when properties are sold; the EU directive to which I alluded requires that. It is entirely consistent with the primary need to use energy supplies more efficiently and is something that the Opposition fully support, but they clearly have difficulties with the means.

Let me take the House on a tour of some questions that need to be addressed to meet the energy certification requirement and the information that the inspector carrying out the survey will need to gather as he or she goes around a property to complete the energy report. The questions include: is it a flat or a semi-detached, a mid-terrace or detached house? When was the property built? Are there any extensions or modifications, and when were they made? What are the walls in the main property or any extension constructed from? Is there any evidence that the walls have been modified, possibly with cavity fill insulation or external insulating render? What is the floor construction? What types of window and glazing are installed? What is the roof construction? Is there a porch or a conservatory or a basement; if so, how big is it, and can it be closed off from the main part of the house and does it have a separate heating system?

For each storey of the property, the inspector needs to measure the floor area, the room height and the length of wall through which heat can escape either to the outside world or into unheated spaces such as a garage, and the area of windows, doors and rooflights.

I put it to the House that this is already starting to sound like a fairly sophisticated assessment, but the requirement goes much further because the following questions must also be addressed: what type and thickness of insulation is there in any loft space? Is there gas or electricity available in the property or in the street? What ventilation rate can be expected in normal circumstances? What space and water heating systems are installed? What controls are there on those systems?

This is not just a question of, "Is it a gas central heating boiler or not?" Instead, the requirement is to determine whether it is a standard boiler or a combination boiler, and whether it is a condensing boiler; how efficient it is; and whether there is a timer, a room thermostat or thermostatic radiator valves. That assumes that the system in question is a straightforward gas system, but it can get a lot more complicated if it is not and the means of heating is from other fuels or local heaters rather than central heating.

Undertaking an energy efficiency assessment is a skilled task, requiring a qualified individual to look at all the key elements of the property such as walls, floor, roof, glazing, space and water heating, and services—in fact, pretty much every element that we are proposing should be considered in the home condition report.

The time required on site to perform an energy efficiency assessment using the reduced data standard assessment procedure methodology would be an hour to an hour and a half, with a relatively short period for subsequent preparation of the report. That compares with an anticipated two hours on site to undertake a full home condition report, plus up to an additional hour to write up the report.

Sir John Butterfill: The Minister is being very generous in giving way, but I am not sure that he fully understands what is likely to be involved in such a report. I speak as a chartered surveyor. To cite an example that occurs frequently, if a building has tile hanging on the exterior, there should be some insulation between it and the plaster walls on the inside—an older property may have lath and plaster—but it is not possible to tell without removing either some tiles from the exterior or some plaster work from the interior whether there is any suitable insulation material between them. That would require considerable work and a labourer on site, and the damage would have to be made good. Even that one element of the report could not be completed in an hour and a half.

Keith Hill: It is perfectly clear that the work that has to be carried out for the energy report and inspection is very much akin to that which needs to be carried out for a home condition report. It is, effectively, a medium-level survey. Quite frankly, it is a sight better than the drive-by survey that is so often done by those who carry out surveys and valuations. I accept, of course, that more detailed work is required in some circumstances, but I make the point that we already have a compulsory system of energy assessment, which will require little by way of add-on—in terms of what needs to be looked at or time—to produce a home condition report.

How long would it take to finalise a stand-alone energy report? We think it would take three to five days—the same time as we expect it to take to get a home condition report and, indeed, assemble the whole pack. So, frankly, the Opposition are offering no time savings. This would also scupper the possibility of first day marketing—another Opposition shibboleth—given that the energy survey has to be made available to enable potential buyers to make comparisons with similar properties.

Mr. Edward Davey: The Minister has spoken in some detail about what would be in such an energy audit, but will he go to the key point? The directive requires that to be done by the time the property is sold, not at the point of marketing. That is the difference between the parties, I believe. We have no objection to energy audit being compulsory and having to be done before sale—that is what the directive requires—but producing a system under which all has to be done before the house is marketed is the genuine big problem here. It will cause so many difficulties in the housing market.

Keith Hill: It seems to me that the hon. Gentleman really is splitting hairs. The fact of the matter is that the work on the energy report has to be done in any circumstances. It has to be done by the point of sale. Why not? What reason is there not to conduct that exercise at the beginning of the process? After all, presumably nobody knows exactly when the point of sale will be. There is absolutely no reason for that work not to be done.

One corollary of the home condition report system is that the period of sale will be considerably reduced because all the information that is required and which takes time to acquire in a normal house sale will be provided up front. So, it seems to me that the hon. Gentleman is not raising a significant reservation.

I am aware that I have spoken for some time, so I want to deal with some issues that have been raised and perhaps come back to offer assurances of the sort that the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) is looking for. The question is often raised that this is an unreasonable imposition on the house seller and those involved in the process. An energy report is essential, but how much will that cost? The industry estimates that a free-standing energy survey will cost at least £150, yet for another £150 sellers and buyers could have a full home condition report and thereby help to solve the problem of the 43 per cent. of failed transactions that result from an unfavourable survey. I would say that that is a good deal, and I firmly believe that buyers and sellers would agree if they were told the facts as distinct from the fiction.

7.30 pm

I keep reading, and the Opposition keep stating, that these provisions will force every house seller to pay £1,000 for a pack. Never mind that the cost is nearer £650, of which £300 will buy the seller the full condition report, including the energy assessment—and never mind that many of the costs are incurred now. What about the benefits? There will be savings to the buyer from fewer mortgage lenders' valuation inspections—exactly how many fewer we do not yet know, but those are commercial decisions that lenders will take in the light of their confidence in the packs and their own plans.

We should not forget that the market is likely to drive down costs. The price of HIPs will be driven down by competition. Last week, Rightmove, members of whose property portal site make up half the entire estate agency market, announced that it is gearing up to provide at least 500,000 packs a year from 2007. That is not far off a third of the total requirement for packs—and that is from just one company, albeit one backed by the Halifax, Countrywide Assured, Connells and Royal Sun Alliance. We know that other players have similar plans.

A number of independent agents have expressed interest in the Rightmove initiative. Critics of our proposals suggest that small estate agents stand to lose out under HIPs, yet here is an example of an initiative that will provide packs for the whole industry, including small agents.

The House will be aware that I have announced that our aim is to introduce these reforms in January 2007. However, I have also made it plain that the reforms will not be implemented until everything is in place and ready to go. We will, of course, take our lead from the industry on that. In that respect, our proposals for a dry run of the home information pack will help everyone to judge the readiness of the market.

To help to ensure a smooth and successful introduction, the Government intend to facilitate a dry run of the full HIPs scheme on a voluntary basis throughout England and Wales from mid-2006. During the dry run, all the components of the statutory scheme will be available for the industry to test and make ready their systems ahead of the introduction of the compulsory scheme. We regard that as a crucial part of our implementation strategy. With the industry, we will closely monitor the dry run and identify any problem areas. If necessary, any problems will be addressed through regulations before the national scheme commences. The flexibility built into the Bill ensures that that can be done quickly.

It was suggested in the other place that the dry run should include a compulsory element in a designated area. Again, the provisions of the Bill are sufficiently flexible to allow that approach. I am happy to consider that further with the industry.

We have no intention of rushing headlong into this with our blinkers on and without any regard for whether the market is ready and the new system works. There is no basis for that sort of accusation, which has been made on other occasions. We are flexible on the issues that several Members have raised, such as the implications of the new compulsory system for low-value homes and for people who are moving out of home ownership, such as the elderly, who will not gain directly from a HIP prepared on another property. There will be open and frank discussion about such matters before the final shape of the scheme is settled.

The housing market is not functioning properly. Consumers—buyers and sellers—want change. We have said that we will deliver that, and have confirmed it in two general election manifestos. The changes cannot be delivered on the scale that is needed under a voluntary system. Compulsion may be regrettable, but in this case it is necessary.

Mr. Hayes: I have seldom heard a Minister expend so much energy so inefficiently. For half an hour, the Minister for Housing and Planning regaled us with his accounts of the glories of home information packs, without addressing a single argument that had been made persuasively by Liberal Democrat peers—I do not often say that—Cross Benchers and, most notably, Conservatives in the other place. The truth is that home information packs, or sellers packs, as they have become known, are not needed and not wanted.

Let me reciprocate the generosity that the Minister displayed at the beginning of his remarks. It is true that the Bill includes many good proposals, and we discussed some of those at length in Committee, but this proposal is not one of them. Extraordinarily, it is against all advice, and the Opposition parties are united on this, although I demur from including the Welsh nationalists, who, I understand, at least from what the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) just signalled, are on the fence.

The other place debated the proposal at great length, and peers of all parties both voted for the amendment and made the case against the Government's position. Despite what the Minister says, there is no widespread demand for sellers packs from buyers and sellers. The only people whom he could cite in support of his contentious—I say that advisedly—proposals were people in New South Wales, people in Denmark and Kate Barker, who was doing the Government's bidding anyway. She was hardly likely to come out and say that they were wrong, when she was commissioned by them to say that they were right. The evidence that the Minister has brought before us is not in any way convincing.

Mr. Kidney: Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Minister was therefore remiss in not repeating, as he did in Committee, that the Consumers Association is a strong supporter of the proposal on the grounds of consumer protection. Is not this proposal necessary to ensure that everybody who buys a home gets the speediest possible service and all the information that they need before signing a cheque for a whacking great price for their house?

Mr. Hayes: I will address both those points, on speed and the quality of information that people receive, in my brief remarks. The hon. Gentleman's point on the Consumers Association is a fair one, and as ever, he makes a good argument. It is a great pity that the Minister, in the full half an hour for which he spoke, was not able to cite it himself, as it was considerably more persuasive than any that he made.

The Minister said that the sellers packs are in response to popular demand, and that the market is not working. I am not convinced. The amendment goes to the heart of the contention over sellers packs. What is the position of the other place, and what is the Government's position? The Government say that everyone will be obliged, by law, despite the run-in period to which the Minister refers, to spend up to £1,000 when selling a house, regardless of the value of that house. In return, they will gain a sellers pack. Let us imagine someone who puts a modest house worth, say, £60,000 or £70,000 on the market, and who must then withdraw it from the market and re-market it some time later. We have no assurance from the Minister that the sellers packs will last any great time. We are told, as the other place debated at some length, that they may be valid for as little as three months. In the scenario that I just described, the person would have to purchase two sellers packs costing up to £2,000 for the sale of a £60,000 house that they might not sell anyway.

Mr. Gummer: Has not my hon. Friend noticed that the Minister prayed in aid the perfectly reasonable statement that an energy audit of a house is needed? He did not mention, of course, that that would last significantly longer than the pack, and that it had a rigour that meant that it was of use to the purchaser, whereas the sellers packs are so lacking in rigour that they will more often lead purchasers astray than be likely to give the kind of information that they would want?

Mr. Hayes: As ever, my right hon. Friend makes an apposite point, with his usual skill and charm. The picture, however, is even worse than he paints it.

I suspect—and the Minister has yet to convince us otherwise—that people will commission additional surveys to supplement these inadequate reports. I invite hon. Members to imagine that they are buying a property and are presented with a sellers pack containing basic information, and to imagine their suspicion about the paucity of that information—and their desire, in the case of an older property or one featuring particular difficulties, to obtain information that is as detailed as possible. I suspect that they would arrange their own survey. Not only will there be a sellers pack floating about; for the reasons my right hon. Friend has given, additional surveys may well be commissioned. Indeed, I suspect that the sellers packs will prompt additional surveys rather than replacing surveys.

Mr. Edward Davey: Many lenders have not said that they will rely on home-commissioned reports. Many will have their own valuations carried out. Moreover, it should be noted that house sales fall through mainly because of valuations done by lenders, as opposed to surveys undertaken by buyers.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman is right, and I shall return to his point if I have time.

Sir John Butterfill: Is there not a great danger that some large firms of estate agents that claim they will co-operate will do so because many poorer vendors cannot afford packs up front? The estate agents will say, "We will supply you with a pack, and when we have sold your property, we will knock the cost off the proceeds of sale." The poor vendors will then be locked into the clutches of estate agents who, in some instances, are quite unscrupulous. They will not be able to change from an estate agent who does not perform properly, because they will have a debt to the agent who supplies the pack.

Mr. Hayes: That is a good point. As was mentioned in Committee, in other countries there are strict regulations—indeed, laws—preventing such a possible conflict of interests. In this country, that does not apply, and the Minister has given no guarantee that it is likely to. I think that there may well be real issues of probity. Such issues were raised in the other place, and they were raised by Conservative and Liberal Democrat spokesmen in Committee. Once again, however, we hear nothing from the Minister, despite the length of his speech.

The Government say that the proposal will speed up the process, and the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) repeated that claim. But the Lords, including Lord Donaldson, say that it may have the opposite effect—that it is likely to slow down the process.

Let us imagine another scenario. Someone may want to put his house on the market quickly. He has in mind a potential buyer, perhaps a person he knows in his locality. He will not even be able to begin the transaction until he has commissioned and put into effect a sellers pack. If neither party has demanded that, it is nonsensical to suggest that it is likely to speed up the market and make it more efficient.

The Government say that sellers packs may cost only £600, but we know that they will not be introduced until 2007. We know that by the time they have become compulsory, things will have moved on. We know that there is no cap on the total price of the packs. The Minister's blithe statement that competition will drive the price down flies in the face of all our experience of buying and selling houses, and of commissioning reports of one sort or another concerning the condition of those houses.

7.45 pm

The Government say that sellers packs will remove the need for other surveys, but as the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) said, mortgage lenders have given no assurances of their willingness to accept them as an alternative to their own surveys. Indeed, the Council of Mortgage Lenders has made clear that it is not prepared to give any such guarantee on behalf of its members. The Minister could not name a single lender that had given an equivalent guarantee. He said that they were all geared up to writing them and were starting businesses in order to roll them out, but that is no surprise, is it? No doubt sellers pack millionaires will emerge from this. That will be the Minister's legacy.

The Government say that sellers packs should be compulsory. In the other place, Lord Hunt described the compulsion issue as the key question. If the packs are such a good idea, why do not the Government trust the people and allow them to say whether they want them or not? If the packs are to replace any other surveys, including those required by the companies offering mortgages, why do the Government not allow them to be voluntary?

The case made by peers throughout the other place was convincing. They said, much as we did, that the Government had failed to persuade anyone of their argument, and we heard the reason for that at the very end of the Minister's long speech. He said that they were obliged to do it because it was in two manifestos. For once, the Government are sticking to a manifesto commitment. That is an unusual and welcome change from common practice.

The Government said that they would do this, and despite all the evidence they intend to do it. In effect, they are saying, "We don't know for how long the sellers packs will be valid, we don't know who will accept them and we don't know what they will cost, but we will impose them on you anyway." They are wrong, the Lords are right, and we will support our noble Friends and other Members of the other place who have championed the cause of sellers and buyers in opposing these silly packs.

Mr. Edward Davey: In the three minutes that remain, may I try to be helpful to the Government?

Lord Rooker said in the other place:

> "I realise that ours is a high-risk strategy . . . The fact that 40,000 dwellings are marketed every week means that if we get our provisions wrong, the Government are in deep trouble."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 3 November 2004; Vol. 666, c. 355.]

I believe that the Government should be a little more cautious. They should think about the risks not just to them but to the millions of home buyers up and down the country. This really is a gamble. The Government have more or less admitted that they will arrange pilot schemes and a voluntary period, but they need to go much further.

The real danger is that the housing market could grind to a halt in some areas, and purchase costs could rise significantly. That could damage not just the economy but many individuals.

Lord Hunt of Wirral quoted comments by the late Earl Russell in one of his last speeches in the other place:

> "There is necessarily a place for compulsion, but it is an unpleasant, expensive and labour-intensive process that will not become easier while the Chancellor is engaged in reducing the number of civil servants. So where something can be done voluntarily and compulsion rendered unnecessary, it is a good thing". —[Official Report, House of Lords, 21 July 2004; Vol. 664, c. 270.]

Earl Russell was right. There is no need for compulsion. There is no demand for it. It will be a costly mistake if the Government push ahead.

I hope that the Government can, through the discussions in this and the other place, put into the Bill the notion that it will keep the home information packs voluntary until another order comes before Parliament. The Minister made great play of the promises in the manifesto. If he reads it again, he will find that the Labour Government promised only to introduce home information packs. Nowhere in the manifesto does it say that they should be compulsory. With the support of the Opposition, the Government could meet the manifesto pledge by keeping the proposal voluntary. Then they will get the support of all parties and of both Houses.

Question put, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Crispin Blunt and
Mr. David Ruffley

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendment disagreed to.

Sir John Butterfill: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It may have come to your attention that the timetabling of the debate on that group of amendments was such that not only did no Back Bencher on either side of the House have the opportunity to speak, but even the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen were obliged to curtail their speeches on probably the most contentious clause—indeed, possibly the only contentious clause—in the Bill. Perhaps you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, could rule on that, and those in another place may wish to take it into account when the Bill goes back to them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): The hon. Gentleman knows that I cannot rule on that matter now; those arrangements were agreed by the House earlier. However, he has got his point on the record and no doubt it will be read by those who are interested in such matters.

Clause 145

HOME CONDITION REPORTS

Lords amendment: No. 140.

Keith Hill: I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take the following: Government amendments (a) to (d) in lieu of the Lords amendment.

Lords amendments Nos. 123 to 127, 129, 131 to 134, 136, 138, 139, 141, 142, 145 to 150 and 260.

Keith Hill: It may be for the benefit of the House if I explain that amendments Nos. 123 to 127, 129, 131 to 134, 136, 138, 139, 141, 146, 150 and 260 are technical amendments that clarify or remove ambiguities or repetition in the Bill, and improve the definition of the word "marketing". Amendments Nos. 142, 145, 147, 148 and 149 would make provision for an estate agents redress scheme. I do not propose to dwell on those amendments at great length, as there seems to be a high level of agreement about the proposals in them—although I shall, of course, be happy to return to them if they are raised by other speakers.

Amendments (a) to (d) in lieu of Lords amendment No. 140 would ensure that adequate safeguards are placed on the register of home condition reports. If the House will forgive me, I shall say a few words about those, because this is new matter for this Chamber.

It will be vital for the public to have confidence in the new home condition reports, and a register for home condition reports will help to ensure that. The register will prevent unscrupulous people from tampering with home condition reports once written, because paper copies can be compared with the register. The register will also ensure that the home condition report can be prepared only by a member of the certification scheme. Someone fraudulently passing himself off as a home inspector —or, indeed, a former home inspector who has been expelled from the scheme—will be unable to register a home condition report.

To guard against the possibility of a seller "shopping around" and obtaining a number of home condition reports from different home inspectors, we propose that the home information pack include copies of all home condition reports obtained on the property within the previous 12 months. The register would ensure that that requirement could be enforced. It would be an important resource to help the certification schemes ensure the competence and probity of home inspectors, and that the inspectors were properly insured. Taken together with the checks and balances already in the Bill, this should enable buyers and sellers to rely with confidence on home condition reports.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Keith Hill: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I feel that I need to say a few more words in amplification of the proposals for the scheme first, but I will happily give way to him in due course.

Provision is already made for such a register in clause 145(5)(d). The purpose of the amendments is to ensure that that register is kept in a proper way. Amendments (a) and (b) to Lords amendment No. 140 strengthen the provisions for approved certification schemes for home inspectors producing home condition reports. The scheme is required to make provision for the registration of all home condition reports. That will greatly enhance the ability of consumers and others to use the home condition report and to trust it, for the reasons that I shall explain.

Certification schemes would be approved by the Secretary of State. They are likely to be run on a not-for-profit basis by private companies owned by stakeholders. We had initially intended the control of access to information on the register to be left to the terms of approval. However, that might not be legally effective, and might not be sufficient to ensure that appropriate and adequate safeguards are placed on the creation and use of the register.

[Keith Hill]

Amendment (c) inserts after clause 145 a new clause that will ensure that the Secretary of State can make regulations allowing any private keeper of the register to restrict access to it to certain limited and prescribed circumstances and purposes. It requires that the onward use of information obtained from the register should respect privacy considerations, and that as far as possible, any conditions imposed by the seller on the use of information in a home information pack, in accordance with clause 139, be respected. It also makes the unauthorised disclosure of information a criminal offence in order to deal with someone who, for example, sells details to a double glazing salesman, or the selling of information on the home of a public figure to a newspaper. Finally, the amendment allows the Secretary of State to maintain the register if the private operator proves unsatisfactory.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Can the Minister say in what form the register be kept? Will it be kept electronically and who will have access to those records? Will the Government have access to them? There is the suspicion that they could use home condition reports to do the next council tax revaluation for nothing. How will the Data Protection Act 1998 protect people's privacy, given that there will be a lot of very private information in the packs?

Keith Hill: It is precisely because I anticipated that the hon. Gentleman—whom I know well, and with whom I have jousted on many previous occasions—would take an interest in these matters that my speech includes what I hope will prove persuasive answers to those issues.

Dealing with these important issues administratively when approving a certification scheme involves doing so behind closed doors, but we feel that it is in everyone's interest that they be dealt with openly and on the record through regulations. The amendment should ensure that the register is kept in a proper way, while respecting privacy considerations. An electronic register of home inspectors and of home condition report data is essential to ensure authenticity and trust. I should emphasise that access to the register will not be a free-for-all and will be strictly controlled.

We envisage that access will be available to the seller and potential buyers, and to their professional advisers and agents, so that they can, for example, check the integrity of copies of home condition reports supplied to them. We also intend to enable access to certification schemes in order to assist with their operation, and to ensure that proper standards are maintained. We envisage that certification schemes will use the register of home condition reports to monitor, or to undertake, spot checks on the work of home inspectors to ensure that they maintain the required standards.

Allowing mortgage lenders online access to the register of home condition reports will assist with valuation assessments and help to avoid unnecessary valuation inspections. It will enhance the efficient operation of the home buying and selling process, and reduce costs for home buyers. We continue to work with the Council of Mortgage Lenders and other stakeholders to ensure that lenders can use the home condition report as a source of information from which a valuation can be derived, without the need for a separate valuation inspection.

Matthew Green: Much of what the Minister is saying is welcome, but I am concerned about what happens when someone chooses to market their property without going through an estate agent, as they have the right to do. When they produce their pack, how will they check who has access to such information? Will a prospective buyer gain access to the register? If so, will they access such information only in respect of the property in question, or will they be able to peruse information on all properties online, simply because they have said that they are interested in buying a particular property? I am slightly confused as to how the process will work.

Keith Hill: It will be for the seller or their agent to make the home condition report available to the potential purchaser. Provision will be made to ensure that access to the report is restricted to those potential buyers to whom the would-be seller wishes such information to be made available. If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I shall spell the situation out in a little more detail in due course.

8.15 pm

The expected content of the home condition report has already been discussed in detail with lenders to ensure that it incorporates the data that they will need to create valuations, using automatic valuation models or other innovative valuation methods. We therefore envisage that access to the register will be allowed to lenders and others involved in carrying out valuation assessments on behalf of lenders.

I should point out that no final decision has been taken as to whether one of the proscribed uses of information from the register will be as a source of statistics on the condition of the nation's housing stock and its energy efficiency. If such a use were permitted, it would be subject to data protection and privacy considerations. Amendment (c) provides for regulations that restrict access to prescribed circumstances or purposes, and to prescribed descriptions of persons. We intend that access will not be indiscriminately available. For example, a potential buyer would need to have the HCR reference number in order to access a home condition report on the register. That reference number would be available only from the seller or their agent, which will ensure that data on the register is not available to any person who cannot satisfy the seller or their agent that he is a bona fide potential buyer.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The Minister has virtually admitted that what I said to him a few minutes ago is true. He says that the Government will use this information for statistical purposes. Is it not true that that will enable them to use it to obtain a revaluation of the entire nation's housing stock at very little cost, and without involving valuers?

Keith Hill: The hon. Gentleman is getting over-excited about a possibility that the Government are not contemplating. We have made no final decisions on this matter, but we do take into account the possibility that the register could be of value in making broad assessments of the condition of the nation's housing stock. The hon. Gentleman takes a close interest in this issue, and he surely will not regard such an approach as disadvantageous, should we decide to pursue it. However, this is a matter for consultation and open discussion in due course.

Mr. Kidney: I hope that my right hon. Friend finds my intervention helpful. Is it the Government's intention to make it a criminal offence for people to disclose information from the register that should not be disclosed, and is that the purport of subsection (7) of amendment (c)? Moreover, is there a typographical error in that subsection? It states:

> "A person who contravenes subsection (3) is guilty of an offence", yet subsection (3) deals with the paying of a fee in order to include a report on the register. In fact, it is the contravening of subsection (4) that would constitute a criminal offence.

Keith Hill: Can the House be surprised that I describe my hon. Friend as my guru in these matters? Not only has he anticipated exactly the point that I was about to make on disclosure, but he has also made a typically shrewd point about a typographical error in the amendment. I can confirm that there is indeed such an error, and it will of course be put right. I am most grateful to him for drawing the House's attention to it, and I am sure that he is grateful for my immediate and positive response. That certainly demonstrates the listening character of this Government and this Minister.

I was about to say that any disclosure, except as provided for in regulations, would be taken very seriously and would amount to a criminal offence. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) is absolutely right about that. Anyone committing such an offence, for instance, by passing on data from home condition reports to a building firm or to the proverbial double glazing salesman, would be liable on summary conviction to a fine of up to level 5 on the standard scale—currently a maximum of £5,000. That is equivalent to the penalty for offences relating to infringing the Data Protection Act 1998. The Home Office has confirmed that criminal offences for the unlawful disclosure of information are the norm in legislation and has approved this particular offence.

Clause 153 provides that the Secretary of State may make grants towards expenditure incurred in connection with the development of proposals for the contents of home information packs or of potential home inspector certification schemes. Amendment (d) is consequential on the introduction of the new clause and provides that the Secretary of State may also make grants towards expenditure incurred in the development of a register of home condition reports.

There are legitimate sensitivities surrounding disclosure of information—I fully concede that to the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown)—we will not know for some time which certification scheme will get approval. We will need to begin work on developing the technology for a secure register of home condition reports as soon as possible in order to address those issues, and that work will require a grant. We also need to ensure that the register is not specific to a particular certification scheme so that it is possible for the keeper of the register to be changed, if necessary, without resulting in practical difficulties.

It is important that consumers and lenders can trust the home condition report and be able to rely on it with confidence. Together with the provisions for home inspectors' certification schemes already in the Bill, these amendments should provide that confidence. In moving these Government amendments, I draw the House's attention to my support for amendments Nos. 142, 145, 147, 148 and 149.

Mr. Syms: This is an important part of the Bill; it is just a pity that we are here at five minutes to midnight debating such important detail. I wish to put a number of questions to the Minister.

The proposal to have a register of approved surveyors or inspectors is sensible because people can check the register to see whether the person is qualified. One of the major concerns in Committee was whether the supply of surveyors or inspectors would be sufficient, so having a register also seems reasonable on those grounds. My question is whether the register will be broken down into regions or counties. There could be a surplus of surveyors in the north-west, with other areas having a deficiency, which could affect the ability to produce home condition reports within a reasonable time frame. It would be helpful to have a breakdown of surveyors and inspectors, including where they live.

The Minister made several points about the home condition report—for example, whether it should have a reference number or be put on the internet and what the controls should be. My hon. Friends have raised a number of concerns about those issues. If the information is too restricted, there is a danger of missing some opportunities. Will the register of home condition reports be made available to those who are registered inspectors or surveyors? If a home has been sold four times and had four home condition reports, the logical starting point for a surveyor would be to look at the last four reports on the home to see whether there had been any problems in the past. It seems silly to start from a blank sheet of paper when, first, there is a shortage of surveyors and, secondly, the home to be inspected has already been inspected many times.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: May I suggest a simple way around that problem? My hon. Friend might want to press the Minister on what I am saying. If the home condition report and home seller's pack become the property of the purchaser on completion of the purchase, the purchaser will then have full property rights and would be well advised if he wanted to sell the house subsequently to make the information available to his surveyor because it would reduce the cost of producing a new home condition report.

Mr. Syms: I thank my hon. Friend for making that reasonable suggestion. I am sure that what he says will be heard. When a house is modern and has been sold a number of times, it would be illogical to deny information about it to registered surveyors or inspectors.

[Mr. Syms]

The Minister also referred to lenders having the information. The standards of building on estates in certain parts of the country are not particularly good, so is it not a matter of concern that, if lenders have access to the register, they might blight certain estates? Accusations are already sometimes made about lenders, particularly when certain areas have a bad reputation. How free will access to lenders be? Will they be able to look at individual reports or at the register in its entirety? I suspect that many lenders will build up a picture, which could lead to decisions being taken on the basis of the postcode. That could be a problem for some people. How will the proposals operate in practice? It is important to get the balance right between having reasonable access so that we do not always have to reinvent the wheel and protecting the privacy of the homeowner or home seller. As the Minister said, we do not want the double glazing salesman or building company to have full access to the information.

If the Minister has enough time, will he say more about whether the insurance scheme for home condition reports is in place? I know that concerns have been raised about that. Insurers are also worried about problems of flooding, underground drainage and so forth. Has a final decision been taken about what type of report will be used for the register? We have only a few more minutes left, so I will end there to allow other hon. Members to ask a few questions.

Matthew Green: I will be brief. We broadly welcome the amendments in the group, including the Government amendments, which go a long way towards dealing with the concerns of the House of Lords, but I want to ask the Minister a couple of questions about the administration and security of the system.

From what the Minister described, it would appear that, under the system, people producing the reports could post them on to a register via a remote server somewhere. The difficulty arises in controlling access to it. The Minister says that buyers will be given a unique number for a particular property, allowing them to look into that single property alone. Even with a good random generator of numbers, given the sheer number of properties available on the market at any one time, it would be possible for someone to guess the numbers and be able to look at other properties. That will be a problem if the register is accessed through a single number, however large. In reality, there are likely to be patterns in the numbers; they are not purely random. From what the Minister described, it would be possible for people to view other properties.

8.30 pm

The question of security raises another potential concern. As we saw last week, online banks can have problems with unauthorised access to some of their systems. Can the Minister be confident that no one could hack into the system holding the details on, say, the house that the Prime Minister has just purchased and sell the information or publish it on the internet? Can the system be secure at the same time as being flexible enough to allow access to all the users who need it? The Minister seems to have much more confidence in the ability to set up a foolproof system than I have.

The amendments have gone a long way towards addressing the issues raised in the other place. We do not support home information packs, but if they do go ahead the amendments will be necessary. On that ground, we will not oppose the Government on this issue tonight.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I shall take one minute to make a few key points and to enable the Minister to reply to the important points that have been made.

First, access to information is critical. One of the key aspects is that, if it is possible for unauthorised people to access the information, the home information packs could become a burglars' charter. I hope that the Minister will reassure us that hackers will not be able to access the information if it is stored electronically. Given the record of such systems, I do not know how he can do that.

Secondly and most importantly, many inspectors will be needed. Inevitably, some of those inspectors will be trained at very short notice and mistakes will therefore be made. It is important that an adequate insurance scheme is in place. People must also have the ability to sue on the reports if they prove to be incorrect. I hope that the Minister can tell us whether that will be the case, because otherwise the reports will have zero value.

Keith Hill: I shall take the issues raised in reverse order. The hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) asked about insurance against error in the reports. I may say that an indemnity scheme has always been part and parcel of the proposition. The indemnity scheme will apply to home inspectors as it already does to conveyancers, and we think that it is a good idea to extend it to estate agents, through the estate agents redress scheme, which has been approved by the other place and has received a general welcome for both particular and general reasons. The monitoring of home condition reports will also allow judgments to be made about the performance of individual inspectors.

The hon. Gentleman raised the hoary old issue of access to information and the burglars' charter. We have gone over that matter on many occasions, but I shall reiterate—given that the allegation always seems to creep into adverse media coverage—that the home condition reports will contain no plans of the property, no information about security devices or alarms and no information about safes. We do not believe that the reports will remotely begin to add up to what he described as a burglars' charter.

The hon. Member for Ludlow (Matthew Green) raised several points and I am grateful for his qualified support. He asked about the operation of the electronic system and whether someone could hack into its numeration arrangements. That is a valid issue. We need to get the details right, and that is why we would do a great deal of work with all the relevant partners to ensure that that could not happen.

The hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) raised several issues. He asked whether lenders will be able to look at individual reports, and the answer is yes. They will have the advantage of looking at the entirety of the property, which is not always the case in the present system. He asked whether the register would be open to other inspectors and would they have access to all home condition reports on the register. Again the answer is yes. He also asked whether there will be regional or local registers, and the answer is yes. I hope that I have been able to reassure him on the points that he raised.

Lords amendment disagreed to.

Government amendments (a) to (d) in lieu of Lords amendment No. 140 agreed to.

New Clause

DECENT HOMES STANDARD FOR SOCIAL HOUSING

Lords amendment: No. 190.

Keith Hill: I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Yes, it is me again. The new clause proposed by the amendment would require the Secretary of State to ensure that, by 2016, all existing social housing stock should, as far as is reasonably practicable, achieve a SAP rating—an energy rating under the standard assessment procedure—of no lower than 65, which would amount to a change in the decent homes standard. I refer to that point because material circulated among Members recognises that the decent homes standard is the Government's vehicle for the delivery of heating and thermal comfort.

I remind Members that the decent homes standard aims to tackle the worst problems. It triggers action; it is not a standard to which work is done. I also remind Members, as I have on earlier occasions, that when the Govt took office in 1997 no fewer than 2.2 million social homes were non-decent and there was a £19 billion backlog of work. The work we have done, and are continuing to do, tackles a range of problems that affect housing—leaking roofs and mould and damp in kitchens and bathrooms that have not been touched since the homes were built, which in some cases was the 1930s. Our work is having a huge impact on the lives of some of the most vulnerable members of society who have lived, or who currently live, in non-decent homes. I said "have lived" because, since 1997, we have reduced by 1 million the number of homes below the decent homes standard—a fact that we celebrate and rejoice in on the Labour Benches.

The decent homes programme is helping to rejuvenate some of our most deprived communities and is contributing towards improving public health and the well-being of tenants. By tackling poor housing, we are facing head-on a problem that is rife in the most disadvantaged communities and that affects the most disadvantaged groups. By making homes decent, in many cases alongside wider regeneration work, we are making whole areas more attractive places in which to live.

I should like to quote some of the tenants whose lives have been changed as a result of the decent homes programme, such as a tenant on a Walsall estate—not in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick), who is in the Chamber, but in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George)—who said:

> "For many years the residents of Delves West felt like they were forgotten. We never seemed to get any investment in our homes. Thanks to the Decent Homes programme we are now making a real difference. Residents are getting the decent homes they've waited for, for so long."

In Redcar, some tenants were "over the moon", and a resident in Kensington and Chelsea, visited by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister in May, said:

> "It was absolute murder before and now it's a godsend".

Amendment No. 190 picks up on one aspect of the decent homes programme—improving the thermal efficiency of homes and, in doing so, contributing to reducing fuel poverty and thereby increasing energy efficiency. We take seriously our responsibilities for alleviating fuel poverty. However, I remind the House that the decent homes programme has four elements: meeting the current statutory minimum standard for housing; achieving a reasonable state of repair; ensuring reasonably modern facilities and services; and providing a reasonable degree of thermal comfort. The programme therefore aims to tackle a wide range of problems and to prioritise the worst homes, of which there remain 1.4 million; including a SAP rating of 65 would add a further 1.7 million households, of which, as I shall demonstrate, only 120,000 would be fuel-poor.

We cannot seek a policy of perfection in regard to one of the four elements of the decent homes standard—thermal comfort—and disregard our obligations to tenants to make more basic improvements. For those people who live in non-decent homes, works such as mending a leaking roof, replacing rotten windows and tackling unsafe electrics matter more than focusing purely on energy efficiency.

Before I continue, it would be useful to explain to the House what fuel poverty is and how many people it affects. Fuel poverty occurs where those in a household spend more than 10 per cent. of their income on heating their home to an adequate standard of warmth. That is generally defined as 21° C in the living room and 18° C in the other occupied rooms. Fuel poverty affects 350,000 social sector households in England. Of course, the Lords amendment applies to the social sector. About 120,000 of those households meet the decent homes standard and about 230,000 households are currently non-decent homes.

We expect that the work done to those 230,000 social homes under the decent homes programme will bring most of those households out of fuel poverty. The work done by authorities is expected to raise the thermal efficiency of those homes well above the minimum that triggers action. The guidance that we have issued recommends that, when loft insulation is fitted, authorities should take the opportunity to improve energy efficiency and install it to a much greater depth than the 50 mm that triggers action and that, when new heating is installed or systems replaced, landlords should install energy efficient boilers where possible. Energy efficient boilers have a SEDBUK—seasonal efficiency of domestic boilers in the UK—A to C rating. We also recommend that landlords take advantage of DEFRA and DTI sponsored programmes that require suppliers of gas and electricity to achieve energy efficiency targets by helping landlords to take up energy efficiency measures.

Matthew Green rose—

Keith Hill: I see that the hon. Gentleman is bestirring himself; and, of course, I give way to him.

Matthew Green: I thank the Minister for giving way, but does he accept that not all the 230,000 households that he says will be raised to the decent homes standard will necessarily reach the SAP 65 rating? Many of those homes may well have to be revisited in future to get them up to that level. In fact, we are talking about guidelines, so some councils—perhaps those facing financial pressures—will not go the whole hog; they will do just enough to meet the decent homes standard without hitting the higher rating.

Keith Hill: Unusually for the hon. Gentleman, he is labouring under a misapprehension. He is usually very precise. In fact, very few of those 230,000 homes are likely to reach the SAP 65 level. That is exactly why I explained that the requirement for SAP 65 would not only embrace the 1.5 million so-called non-decent homes that we propose to tackle using the decent homes programme up to 2010, but entail a return to a further 1.7 million social sector homes that do not attain the SAP 65 level. The important thing to remember is that fuel poverty relates to the percentage of income that is necessarily expended to achieve a decent level of thermal comfort.

8.45 pm

Many householders who live in homes that do not have a SAP rating of 65 are not in fuel poverty because they do not spend a sufficiently high proportion of their incomes on the issue. It is terribly important for all hon. Members to bear it in mind that fuel poverty is a factor of not the physical fabric of a property, but the relationship between thermal comfort, or the need to compensate for heating loss, and income. The truth is that only a small proportion of those in fuel poverty live in social homes that are below the decent homes standard—about 120,000. Many people who live in fuel poverty might live in homes with a SAP 65 rating, which is why our fundamental argument is that it would be an immense over-reaction to insist on the SAP 65 standard across the board to lift households out of fuel poverty. It would be like using a JCB to smash a nut.

Brian White: Tackling fuel poverty is a key objective for the Government. However, they have several other objectives, such as reducing CO_2 emissions, which SAP 65 would help us to achieve. The Minister is missing the interaction between the objectives.

Keith Hill: I disagree with my hon. Friend, although I do not often do that because we have a good relationship both inside and outside the Chamber. We have dealt with such matters already. I have demonstrated that the Government are clearly committed to, and on route towards, achieving their carbon saving and energy efficiency targets. We mislead ourselves if we confuse energy efficiency and fuel poverty because they are different issues that we must separate in our minds.

The Government's argument is that the small numbers of households in fuel poverty should be dealt with individually. Interestingly, such households are characteristically not made up of senior citizens. They tend to be made up of people on low incomes living in three-bedroom houses. It is clearly possible to devise strategies to deal with such individuals. Indeed, the fuel poverty action plan has been designed to ensure that fuel poverty will be eliminated in such vulnerable households by the year 2010, and a report is due later this year. For all those reasons, although I take my hon. Friend's point about energy efficiency on board, we need to focus carefully on the precise sources of fuel poverty.

David Taylor: My right hon. Friend is one of the more lucid, rational, thoughtful and, especially, numerate Ministers—he is no doubt set for further promotion. Does he agree that if the only available options to address local authority tenants facing fuel poverty are stock transfer, the private finance initiative and arm's-length management organisations, all of which are more expensive than conventional local authority methods of raising houses to a decent standard, fewer houses will be tackled with the available pot of money than would have been the case if he had delivered option four, as he told the fringe meetings at the party conference that he would?

Keith Hill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who teases me. Although I know that there is an undercurrent of great seriousness in his observations, I sometimes feel that the fourth option is to him what King Charles's head was to Mr. Dick in "David Copperfield". I decline to be sucked down that vortex.

We have issued guidance that is designed to improve energy efficiency. The effectiveness of what is being done to improve heating and insulation under the decent homes programme is demonstrated by what our tenants say about it. A tenant in my hon. Friend's and mine beloved east midlands said:

> "At last I have decent heating and a radiator in every room, meaning my home is not only warm and cosy but actually cheaper to heat than before."

Another tenant in Chelmsford—I like to demonstrate a regional reach in my examples—described how her heating bills dropped from £35 a week in winter to £8 a week all year round.

We are working very hard to ensure that the Government meet their target on alleviating fuel poverty and improving energy efficiency, but I recognise that about 120,000 householders who live in homes that are above the decent homes threshold are in fuel poverty. However, it is not necessarily the very poor energy efficiency of the homes that is the main problem. As I have said, most of the households are single non-pensioner households on extremely low incomes living in three-bedroom homes. There are other issues to tackle beyond work to the physical fabric of the home.

Matthew Green: Will the Minister give way?

Keith Hill: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will make progress because other colleagues want to contribute. I am conscious that I have spoken at some length on this amendment and others. I dare say that he will have his opportunity later.

Amendment No. 190 wants us to tackle the problem of having around 120,000 households in fuel poverty in the social sector by increasing by 1.7 million the number of homes that would need work in accordance with the decent homes standard. Those homes are currently decent but below SAP 65, and they would more than double the number that we still have to tackle under the programme. The amendment would require the minimum standard that triggers action to be SAP 65. That would cost—I say this in all earnestness—£28.5 billion to solve a problem in 120,000 homes. That is roughly equivalent to 8p on the basic rate of tax. This is more than a sledgehammer to crack a nut. The amendment is a JCB. Indeed, a JCB might be the only solution for many homes if all social housing is to achieve a SAP 65 rating. An estimated 400,000 homes could not be brought up to that level of energy efficiency. For those, demolition and rebuilding would be the only solution at a cost of more than £20 billion, excluding any costs of re-acquiring property.

For the homes that could achieve SAP 65, some would require additional work over and above basic measures to improve their energy efficiency. For example, we would have to carry out insulation to the solid walls. That would cost £6 billion. Then there are those homes that would not be in the decent homes programme since they already meet the current levels of thermal comfort required. Work in those homes would include replacing boilers that are still functioning, modifying electric immersion heaters and installing double-glazing, which would cost £2.5 billion.

The grand total comes to an astonishing £28.5 billion. Demolition and rebuilding would cost more than £20 billion. Tackling hard-to-heat homes would cost £6 billion. To cover homes that do not currently come under the decent homes programme would cost £2.5 billion. That extra expenditure would cripple the budgets of local authorities and many housing associations. It would mean that work on wider regeneration work, including security measures and environmental improvements, would go undone. Those things matter to tenants, and how would we explain to them that those priorities would no longer be addressed? The new target would amount to moving the goalposts for social landlords who have been working hard to achieve the decent homes standard. Planned programmes of works would need to be rescheduled, which would disrupt not only landlords but tenants.

Even if it were possible to achieve SAP 65 for the social sector at a reasonable cost, it would still be unwise to fix that in statute. The standard assessment procedure measures energy efficiency on an index calculated by considering the annual space and water-heating costs for a standard heating regime. It is a constantly evolving mechanism that will change in response to new energy efficiency technology and changes in fuel prices. We have a huge range of social housing stock in this country, and a SAP target of 65 would be expensive, unachievable and inflexible. We prefer action on achievable targets to aspirations that, frankly, have not been properly thought through. We want to deliver on our decent homes programme by 2010, not see it jeopardised and perhaps put back to 2016. Above all, we cannot choose one part of our decent homes programme and promote it above everything else. We have a duty to tenants, and must provide them with the improvements in their living conditions that really matter to them. While energy efficiency may be the primary concern for some people, it is certainly not the primary concern for all social sector tenants. Our efforts in this area should remain focused on delivering the essential work needed to make all homes decent, and in doing so we must always maximise energy efficiency and promote the alleviation of fuel poverty. However, to put those two concerns above all else would be unrealistic.

In conclusion, a target of SAP 65 for all social sector homes would cost the taxpayer about £28.5 billion. The Government are committed to dealing with fuel poverty and to improving energy efficiency. However, we are not committed to doing that in an impractical and ludicrously expensive manner, as the amendment suggests. It is for those reasons that I invite the House to disagree with the amendment.

Mr. Hayes: The Minister said that the amendment, which was supported in the Lords by Liberal Democrats, Conservatives and Cross Benchers, but not by members of the governing party, was a sledgehammer to crack a nut. He said that it was like using a JCB or a juggernaut to deal with a problem that could be dealt with much more lightly. However, it has managed to attract the support of no less a group of people than the National Pensioners Convention, Shelter, Age Concern, Help the Aged, the National Right to Fuel Campaign, WWF, the Campaign to Protect Rural England, the all-party groups on warm homes and on intelligent energy, the Association for the Conservation of Energy and National Energy Action. Most people who are concerned about the welfare of some of our most vulnerable citizens, as well as most people who are concerned about energy conservation, disagree fundamentally with the Minister's analysis.

Dr. Iddon rose—

Mr. Hayes: If the amendment is a sledgehammer to crack a nut, it is supported by a considerable number of people worth listening to, perhaps including the hon. Gentleman.

Dr. Iddon: I was chairman of housing when the Conservatives were in power, and I suffered a 75 per cent. cut in funding for both the private and public sectors. Having listened to the hon. Gentleman, may I ask whether, if they regain power, the Conservatives would commit themselves to a SAP rating of 65?

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman is a wise and shrewd enough parliamentarian to know that you would not permit me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to detach myself from the proper consideration of the amendment and meander into a debate about the history, interesting as it may be, of his service in local government, or indeed into a fanciful discussion about what may happen at a distant time in the future—although in fact I do not expect it to be very distant, as I should be replacing the Minister in a few months' time if what we read in the press is true.

I will be absolutely straight with the hon. Gentleman, who speaks with great passion about these subjects: the Conservatives, if I have anything to do with it, will take the issue of fuel poverty seriously. I believe very strongly in the warm homes agenda, and I will certainly, as Minister, review what he has said and done with a view to making significant progress in the campaign against fuel poverty. That is said genuinely; I am not trying to evade his point. He would not expect a bigger commitment than that, given that I am the Opposition spokesman, not the Minister, but I assure him that I will address the issue of fuel poverty when I become Minister and get the red boxes, the car and all the rest of it in a few months' time, and when the Minister begins to enjoy his long retirement and is relieved of the appropriate pressure that is being brought to bear on him.

9 pm

The amendment demands that all social housing should meet the standard assessment procedure rating of 65. That is the measure of energy efficiency in homes that is agreed by the Government and recognised elsewhere. There are two aspects to this debate: one concerns carbon emission targets, and the other fuel poverty. Both were well aired in the other place. Perhaps I may beg your indulgence for a second, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to pay tribute to Baroness Hanham and Lord Hanningfield, who did much good work there, together with noble colleagues from other parties. I single them out for particular praise because they did their very best to improve the worst aspects of the Bill. Lord Hanningfield pointed out that the Government had a manifesto commitment to decrease CO_2 emissions by 20 per cent. by 2010 based on 1990 levels; that from 1990 to 1997 carbon emissions decreased by 13.1 megatonnes of carbon; and that since this Government were elected in 1997 they have remained virtually static, while in three of the past four years they have increased. In August this year, the Environmental Audit Committee reported that the Government's latest forecasts indicate that carbon emissions by 2010 will be 8 megatonnes more than the target—a 25 per cent. shortfall.

The amendment calls for a 20 per cent. improvement in domestic energy efficiency by 2010, based on 2000 levels. That is equivalent to the saving of 5 megatonnes of carbon emissions from the domestic sector by 2010 that the Government originally stated as their intention and is the target that they assured the public no fewer than 15 times would be set as the energy efficiency aim under the Sustainable Energy Act 2003. A range of Ministers assured both Houses that that would be the case, until April this year when they reduced it to 16 per cent.—a saving of 4.2 megatonnes.

The original target is supported by the Energy Saving Trust, the Government's official adviser on energy efficiency; the Cabinet Office performance and innovation unit, the Government's advisers on energy policy; and the Sustainable Development Commission, the Government's advisers on sustainable development. It is also supported by a large number of Members on both sides of the House, particularly on the Labour Benches, who have taken fuel poverty, carbon emissions, the relationship between the two and the need for better energy conservation very seriously, campaigned on it, spoken on it and made their position patently clear, whereas the Government's position on this is not at all clear. There are fundamental contradictions between what they have said in the past and what they are saying now; but even more than that, there are—heaven forbid—contradictions between what different Ministers say about it.

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment said that

> "research has shown that bringing homes to a SAP rating of 65 is a level at which there is a minimal risk of a household being in fuel poverty."—[Official Report, 19 April 2004; Vol. 420, c. 138W.]

Lord Whitty expressed sympathy with the amendment. On 19 October, at a meeting of the all-party warm homes group in Committee Room 17 in the House of Commons, the same point was made to him. He replied:

> "I have sympathy with this . . . I am not defending ODPM."

It is clear that the ODPM and the Minister stand alone in the matter. Even his ministerial colleagues are not prepared to line up alongside him and defend the change of policy. Apart from concerns about emissions and the Government's failure to meet their targets, there are even more profound anxieties about the impact on many vulnerable people.

The Government have a legal duty to end fuel poverty under the Warm Homes and Energy Conservation Act 2000. The Minister has spoken about the meaning of fuel poverty and made it clear that he shares the commitment to combat it. However, the Government have agreed that a SAP rating of 65 is needed to achieve that objective. Other Ministers have made it clear that the only way in which the Government will achieve their aim is by adopting a different policy—that which is outlined in the amendment. The Government's figures demonstrate that. In 2001, the Department of Transport, Local Government and the Regions consultation on the decent homes standard stated:

> "Twenty-five per cent. of social sector tenants living in homes with these stock measures"— insulation and heating measures that comply with the current decent homes standards—

> "are still fuel poor."

Twenty-five per cent. is approximately 650,000 or 1.4 million people, based on the national average of 2.2 people per household.

The latest figures suggest that more than 1.141 million homes fall below standards on the ground of thermal insulation. The current policy is to bring those homes up to a decent homes standard, which will not necessarily mean that they escape fuel poverty. It is not good enough for the Minister to say that the Government are committed to decent homes. Of course it is right to improve the stock of social housing in all sorts of ways but it is unacceptable not to tackle the fundamental issue of insulation and fuel poverty as part of that, in order to deliver the Government's stated aims.

The House of Lords debated the matter in a measured and reasoned way. The debate showed the passions of Members from across the political spectrum. It was not simply a matter of knockabout, Opposition versus Government, politics. Any reading of the debate reveals a genuine commitment on behalf of hard-pressed people.

The gist of the Government's case is straightforward. They have effectively reneged on their original commitment. They have lowered the bar because they know that it will be difficult to reach the standard that the amendment demands of them. The excuse that the Minister gave initially in his contribution was that doing so would mean taking their eye off the ball for other aspects of the decent homes standard. However, he gave the game away at the end of his speech by saying that it was all about cost. He thus confirmed what was said in the Lords. In answering the proponents of the amendment, Lord Bassam said that it would focus on one aspect of decent homes to the detriment of others. He said:

> "That is what the amendment would do, but at a potentially huge cost . . . bringing all social housing up to a standard of SAP 65 could add £3 billion to £5 billion to the cost of the decent homes programme."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 3 November 2004; Vol. 666, c. 379.]

It is not as simple as that, however, because failing to support this amendment will waste vast sums of public money. The Government will ensure that works are undertaken on all social homes to bring them up to the decent homes standard, but they will still leave a large number of people in fuel poverty. The law will require them to address that issue at some stage in the future and to spend additional sums to take those people out of fuel poverty. The truth of the matter is that this is a false economy. If the Government were to get this right now, they could fulfil their legal responsibilities in one coherent and consistent programme. Instead, however, what Lord Hanningfield has described as the "double visit" to the project will cost more and be extremely wasteful. The Government's argument about money does not stack up, given that they have acknowledged their overriding legal duty in this regard.

More than that, I disagree fundamentally with the Minister on this. This is a very important issue indeed, and not to address fuel poverty would be a dreadful shame that the Minister and the Government would have to carry.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: I apologise to the hon. Lady, but I am about to finish. I am usually very generous with interventions, as she well knows, but I want to give other hon. Members time to speak. Perhaps she will be one of them.

The freedom from fear and the freedom from want are fundamental objectives of any decent Government, and this Government should live up to those principles—[Interruption.] Well, the hon. Member for Eltham (Clive Efford) may chafe, but there are people on this side of the Chamber—and, I am sure, on his side—who believe that the mitigation of disadvantage is the greatest purpose of politics. I believe that to be the case, and I make no bones about stating it. I have always believed it, and I have said so many times. This is not a recent conversion for me.

Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Hayes: I am not going to give way, so I am not sure why the hon. Gentleman is standing.
